And these Readings were throughout so conspicuously and so radiantly a success, that even in the recollection of them, now that they are things of the past, it may be said that they have already beneficially influenced, and are still perceptibly advancing, the wider and keener appreciation of the writings themselves. In its gyrations the ball then rolling at the Reader's foot imparted a momentum to one far nobler and more lasting — that of the Novelist's reputation, one that in its movement gives no sign of slackening — "labitur et labetur in omne volubilis seivum."

The long continuance of the remarkable success attendant upon the Readings all through, is only to be explained by the extraordinary care and earnestness the Reader lavished continuously upon his task when once it had been undertaken. In this he was only in another phase of his career, consistently true to the one simple rule adopted by him as an artist throughout. What that rule was anyone might see at a glance on turning over the leaves of one of his books, it matters not which, in the original manuscript. There, the countless alterations, erasures, interpolations, transpositions, interlineations, shew plainly enough the minute and conscientious thought devoted to the perfecting, so far as might be in any way possible, of the work of composition. What reads so unaffectedly and so felicitously, it is then seen, is but the result of exquisite consideration. It is Sheridan's whimsical line which declares that, —

- "Easy writing's cursed hard reading."

And it is Pope who summarizes the method by which not "easy writing" but "ease in writing" is arrived at, where it is said of those who have acquired a mastery of the craft, —

"They polish all with so much life and ease, You think 'tis nature and a knack to please: But ease in writing flows from art, not chance; As those move easiest who have learn'd to dance."

Precisely the same elaboration of care, which all through his career was dedicated by Charles Dickens to the most delightful labour of his life, that of writing, was accorded by him to the lesser but still eminently intellectual toil of preparing his Readings for representation. It was not by any means that, having written a story years previously, he had, in his new capacity as a reciter, merely to select two or three chapters from it, and read them off with an air of animation. Virtually, the fragmentary portions thus taken from his larger works were re-written by him, with countless elisions and eliminations after having been selected. Reprinted in their new shape, each as "A Reading," they were then touched and retouched by their author, pen in hand, until, at the end of a long succession of revisions, the pages came to be cobwebbed over with a wonderfully intricate network of blots and lines in the way of correction or of obliteration. Several of the leaves in this way, what with the black letter-press on the white paper, being scored out or interwoven with a tracery in red ink and blue ink alternately, present to view a curiously parti-coloured or tessellated appearance. As a specimen page, however, will afford a more vivid illustration upon the instant of what is referred to, than could be conveyed by any mere verbal description, a facsimile is here introduced of a single page taken from the "Reading of Little Dombey."

Whatever thought was lavished thus upon the composition of the Readings, was lavished quite as unstintingly upon the manner of their delivery. Thoroughly natural, impulsive, and seemingly artless, though that manner always appeared at the moment, it is due to the Reader as an artist to assert that it was throughout the result of a scarcely credible amount of forethought and preparation. It is thus invariably indeed with every great proficient in the histrionic art, even with those who are quite erroneously supposed by the outer public to trust nearly everything to the momentary impulses of genius, and who are therefore presumed to disdain anything whatever in the way either of forethought or of actual preparation by rehearsal.

According to what is, even down to this present day, very generally conjectured, Edmund Kean, one of the greatest tragedians who ever trod the stage, is popularly imagined to have always played simply, as might be said, hap-hazard, trusting himself to the spur of the moment for throwing himself into a part passionately; — the fact being exactly the reverse in his regard, according to the earliest and most accurate of his biographers. Erratic, fitful though the genius of Edmund Kean unquestionably was — rendering him peerless as Othello, incomparable as Overreach — we are told in Mr. Procter's life of him, that "he studied long and anxiously," frequently until many hours after midnight.{*} No matter what his occupations previously might have been, or how profound his exhaustion through rehearsing in the forenoon, and performing in the evening, and sharing in convivialities afterwards, Barry Cornwall relates of him that he would often begin to study when his family had retired for the night, practising in solitude, after he had transformed his drawing-room into a stage in miniature.

- * Barry Cornwall's Life of Edmund Kean, Vol. II. p. 85

"Here," says his biographer, "with a dozen candles, some on the floor, some on the table, and some on the chimney-piece, and near the pier-glass, he would act scene after scene: considering the emphasis, the modulation of the verse, and the fluctuations of the character with the greatest care." And this, remember, has relation to one who was presumably about the most spontaneous and impulsive actor who ever flashed meteor-like across the boards of a theatre. Whoever has the soul of an artist grudges no labour given to his art, be he reader or actor, author or tragedian. Charles Dickens certainly spared none to his Readings in his conscientious endeavour to give his own imaginings visible and audible embodiment. The sincerity of his devotion to his task, when once it had been taken in hand, was in its way something remarkable.

Acting of all kinds has been pronounced by Mrs. Butler — herself in her own good day a rarely accomplished reader and a fine tragic actress — ”a monstrous anomaly.”{*}

- * Fanny Kemble’s Journal, Vol. II. p. 130.

As illustrative of her meaning in which phrase, she then adds, “John Kemble and Mrs. Siddons were always in earnest in what they were about; Miss O’Neil used to cry bitterly in all her tragic parts; whilst Garrick could be making faces and playing tricks in the middle of his finest points, and Kean would talk gibberish while the people were in an uproar of applause at his.” Fanny Kemble further remarks: “In my own individual instance, I know that sometimes I could turn every word I am saying into burlesque,” — immediately observing here, in a reverential parenthesis “(never Shakspeare, by-the-bye) — and at others my heart aches and I cry real, bitter, warm tears as earnestly as if I was in earnest.” Reading which last sentence, one might very safely predicate that in the one instance, where she could turn her words into burlesque, she would be certain to act but indifferently, whereas in the other, with the hot, scalding tears running down her face, she could not by necessity do otherwise than act to admiration.

So thorough and consistent throughout his reading career was the sincerity of Dickens in his impersonations, that his words and looks, his thoughts and emotions were never mere make-believes, but always, so far as the most vigilant eye or the most sensitive ear could detect, had their full and original significance.

With all respect for Miss O’Neil’s emotion, and for that candidly confessed to by Mrs. Butler, as having been occasionally evidenced by herself, the true art, we should have said, subsists in the indication and the repression, far rather than in the actual exhibition or manifestation of the emotions that are to be represented. Better by far than the familiar si vis me flere axiom of Horace, who there tells us, “If you would have me weep, you must first weep yourself,” is the sagacious comment on it in the Tatler, where (No. 68) the essayist remarks, with subtle discrimination: “The true art seems to be when you would have the person you represent pitied, you must show him at once, in the highest grief, and struggling to bear it with decency and patience. In this case,” adds the writer, “we sigh for him, and give him every groan he suppresses.” As for the extravagant idea of any artist, however great, identifying himself for the time being with the part he is enacting, who is there that can wonder at the snort of indignation with which Doctor Johnson, talking one day about acting, asked Mr. Kemble, "Are you, sir, one of those enthusiasts who believe yourself transformed into the very character you represent?" Kemble answering, according to Boswell, that he had never himself felt so strong a persuasion — "To be sure not, sir," says Johnson, "the thing is impossible." Adding, with one of his dryly comical extravagances: "And if Garrick really believed himself to be that monster Richard the Third, he deserved to be hanged every time he performed it." What Dickens himself really thought of these wilder affectations of intensity among impersonators, is, with delicious humour, plainly enough indicated through that preposterous reminiscence of Mr. Crummies, "We had a first-tragedy man in our company once, who, when he played Othello, used to black himself all over! But that's feeling a part, and going into it as if you meant it; it isn't usual — more's the pity." Thoroughly giving himself up to the representation of whatever character he was endeavouring at the moment to portray, or rather to impersonate, Charles Dickens so completely held his judgment the while in equipoise, as master of his twofold craft — that is, both as creator and as elocutionist, as author and as reader — that, as an invariable rule, he betrayed neither of those signs of insincerity, by the inadvertent revelation of which all sense of illusion is utterly and instantly dissipated.

Whatever scenes he described, those scenes his hearers appeared to be actually witnessing themselves. He realised everything in his own mind so intensely, that listening to him we realised what he spoke of by sympathy. Insomuch that one might, in his own words, say of him, as David Copperfield says of Mr. Peggotty, when the latter has been recounting little Emily's wanderings: "He saw everything he related. It passed before him, as he spoke, so vividly, that, in the intensity of his earnestness, he presented what he described to me with greater distinctness than I can express. I can hardly believe — writing now long afterwards — but that I was actually present in those scenes; they are impressed upon me with such an astonishing air of fidelity." While, on the one hand, he never repeated the words that had to be delivered phlegmatically, or as by rote; on the other hand, he never permitted voice, look, gesture, to pass the limits of discretion, even at moments the most impassioned; as, for example, where Nancy, in the famous murder-scene, shrieked forth her last gasping and despairing appeals to her brutal paramour. The same thing may be remarked again in regard to all the more tenderly pathetic of his delineations. His tones then were often subdued almost to a whisper, every syllable, nevertheless, being so distinctly articulated as to be audible in the remotest part of a vast hall like that in Piccadilly.

Whatever may be insinuated in regard to those particular portions of the writings of our great novelist by cynical depreciators, who have not the heart to recognise — as did Lord Jeffrey, for instance, one of the keenest and shrewdest critics of his age — the exquisite pathos of a death-scene like that of little Nell or of little Paul Dombey, in the utterance by himself of those familiar passages nothing but the manliest emotion was visible and audible from first to last. Insomuch was this the case, that the least impressionable of his hearers might readily have echoed those noble words, written years ago, out of an overflowing heart, in regard to Charles Dickens, by his great rival and his intense admirer, W. M. Thackeray: “In those admirable touches of tender humour, who ever equalled this great genius? There are little words and phrases in his books which are like personal benefits to the reader. What a place to hold in the affections of men! What an awful responsibility hanging over a writer!” And so on, Thackeray saying all this! Thackeray speaking thus in ejaculatory sentences indicative of his gratitude and of his admiration! Passages that to men like William Thackeray and Francis Jeffrey were expressive only of inimitable tenderness, might be read dry-eyed by less keen appreciators, from the printed page, might even be ludicrously depreciated by them as mere mawkish sentimentality. But, even among these, there was hardly one who could hear those very passages read by Dickens himself without recognising at last, what had hitherto remained unperceived and unsuspected, the gracious and pathetic beauty animating every thought and every word in the original descriptions. Equally, it may be said, in the delineation of terror and of pathos, in the murder-scene from Oliver Twist, and in the death-scene of little Dombey, the novelist-reader attained success by the simple fact of his never once exaggerating.

It has been well remarked by an eminent authority upon the art of elocution, whose opinions have been already quoted in these pages, to wit, John Ireland, that “There is a point to which the passions must be raised to display that exhibition of them which scatters contagious tenderness through the whole theatre, but carried, though but the breadth of a hair, beyond that point, the picture becomes an overcharged caricature, as likely to create laughter as diffuse distress.” Never, perhaps, has that subtle boundary-line been hit with more admirable dexterity, just within the hair’s breadth here indicated, than it was, for example, in Macready’s impersonation of Virginius, where his scream in the camp-scene betrayed his instantaneous appreciation of the wrong meditated by Appius Claudius against the virginal purity of his daughter. As adroitly, in his way, as that great master of his craft, who was for so many years among his most cherished friends and intimates, Dickens kept within the indicated lines of demarcation, beyond which no impersonator, whether upon the stage or upon the platform, can ever pass for a single instant with impunity.

Speaking of Munden, in one of the most charming of his Essays, Charles Lamb has said, “I have seen him diffuse a glow of sentiment which has made the pulse of a crowded house beat like that of one man; when he has come in aid of the pulpit, doing good to the moral heart of a people.” The words, applied thus emphatically to the humorous and often grotesque comedian, are exactly applicable to Dickens as a Reader. And, as Elia remarks of Munden at another moment, “he is not one, but legion; not so much a comedian as a company” — any one might say identically the same of Dickens, who bears in remembrance the wonderful variety of his impersonations.

Attending his Readings, character after character appeared before us, living and breathing, in the flesh, as we looked and listened. It mattered nothing, just simply nothing, that the great author was there all the while before his audience in his own identity. His evening costume was a matter of no consideration — the flower in his button-hole, the paper-knife in his hand, the book before him, that earnest, animated, mobile, delightful face, that we all knew by heart through his ubiquitous photographs — all were equally of no account whatever. We knew that he alone was there all the time before us, reading, or, to speak more accurately, re-creating for us, one and all — while his lips were articulating the familiar words his hand had written so many years previously — the most renowned of the imaginary creatures peopling his books. Watching him, hearkening to him, while he stood there unmistakably before his audience, on the raised platform, in the glare of the gas-burners shining down upon him from behind the pendant screen immediately above his head, his individuality, so to express it, altogether disappeared, and we saw before us instead, just as the case might happen to be, Mr. Pickwick, or Mrs. Gamp, or Dr. Marigold, or little Paul Dombey, or Mr. Squeers, or Sam Weller, or Mr. Peggotty, or some other of those immortal personages. We were as conscious, as though we saw them, of the bald head, the spectacles, and the little gaiters of Mr. Pickwick — of the snuffy tones, the immense umbrella, and the voluminous bonnet and gown of Mrs. Gamp — of the belcher necktie, the mother-of-pearl buttons and the coloured waistcoat of the voluble Cheap Jack — of little Paul's sweet face and gentle accents — of the one eye and the well-known pair of Wellingtons, adorning the head and legs of Mr. Wackford Squeers — of Sam's imperturbable nonchalance — and of Mr. Peggotty's hearty, briny, sou'-wester of a voice and general demeanour!

Even the lesser characters — those which are introduced into the original works quite incidentally, occupying there a wholly subordinate position, filling up a space in the crowded tableaux, always in the background — were then at last brought to the fore in the course of these Readings, and suddenly and for the first time assumed to themselves a distinct importance and individuality. Take, for instance, the nameless lodging-housekeeper's slavey, who assists at Bob Sawyer's party, and who is described in the original work as "a dirty, slipshod girl, in black cotton stockings, who might have passed for the neglected daughter of a superannuated dustman in very reduced circumstances." No one had ever realised the crass stupidity of that remarkable young person — dense and impenetrable as a London fog — until her first introduction in these Readings, with "Please, Mister Sawyer, Missis Raddle wants to speak to you!" — the dull, dead-level of her voice ending in the last monosyllable with a series of inflections almost amounting to a chromatic passage. Mr. Justice Stareleigh, again! — nobody had ever conceived the world of humorous suggestiveness underlying all the words put into his mouth until the author's utterance of them came to the readers of Pickwick with the surprise of a revelation. Jack Hopkins in like manner — nobody, one might say, had ever dreamt of as he was in Dickens's inimitably droll impersonation of him, until the lights and shades of the finished picture were first of all brought out by the Reading. Jack Hopkins! — with the short, sharp, quick articulation, rather stiff in the neck, with a dryly comic look just under the eyelids, with a scarcely expressible relish of his own for every detail of that wonderful story of his about the "neckluss," an absolute and implicit reliance upon Mr. Pickwick's gullibility, and an inborn and ineradicable passion for chorusing.

As with the characters, so with the descriptions. One was life itself, the other was not simply word-painting, but realisation. There was the Great Storm at Yarmouth, for example, at the close of David Copperfield. Listening to that Reading, the very portents of the coming tempest came before us! — the flying clouds in wild and murky confusion, the moon apparently plunging headlong among them, “as if, in a dread disturbance of the laws of nature, she had lost her way and were frightened,” the wind rising “with an extraordinary great sound,” the sweeping gusts of rain coming before it “like showers of steel,” and at last, down upon the shore and by the surf among the turmoil of the blinding wind, the flying stones and sand, “the tremendous sea itself,” that came rolling in with an awful noise absolutely confounding to the beholder! In all fiction there is no grander description than that of one of the sublimest spectacles in nature. The merest fragments of it conjured up the entire scene — aided as those fragments were by the look, the tones, the whole manner of the Reader. The listener was there with him in imagination upon the beach, beside David. He was there, lashed and saturated with the salt spray, the briny taste of it on his lips, the roar and tumult in his ears — the height to which the breakers rose, and, looking over one another bore one another down and rolled in, in interminable hosts, becoming at last, as it is written in that wonderful chapter (55) of David Copperfield, “most appalling!” There, in truth, the success achieved was more than an elocutionary triumph — it was the realisation to his hearers, by one who had the soul of a poet, and the gifts of an orator, and the genius of a great and vividly imaginative author, of a convulsion of nature when nature bears an aspect the grandest and the most astounding. However much a masterly description, like that of the Great Storm at Yarmouth, may be admired henceforth by those who never had the opportunity of attending these Readings, one might surely say to them, as Æschines said to the Rhodians, when they were applauding the speech of his victorious rival: “How much greater would have been your admiration if only you could have heard him deliver it!”

THE READINGS IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

How it happened that Charles Dickens came to give any readings at all from his own writings has already, in the preceding pages, been explained. What is here intended to be done is to put on record, as simply and as accurately as possible, the facts relating to the labours gone through by the Novelist in his professional character as a Public Reader. It will be then seen, immediately those facts have come to be examined in their chronological order, that they were sufficiently remarkable in many respects, as an episode in the life of a great author, to justify their being chronicled in some way or other, if only as constituting in their aggregate a wholly unexampled incident in the history of literature.

No writer, it may be confidently asserted, has ever enjoyed a wider popularity during his own life-time than Charles Dickens; or rather it might be said more accurately, no writer has ever enjoyed so wide a popularity among his own immediate contemporaries. And it was a popularity in many ways exceptional.

It knew no fluctuation. It lasted without fading or faltering during thirty-four years altogether, that is to say, throughout the whole of Dickens's career as a novelist. It began with his very first book, when, as Thackeray put it, "the young man came and took his place calmly at the head of the whole tribe, as the master of all the English humorists of his generation." It showed no sign whatever of abatement, when, in the middle of writing his last book, the pen fell from his hand on that bright summer's day, and through his death a pang of grief was brought home to millions of English-speaking people in both hemispheres. For his popularity had, among other distinctive characteristics, certainly this, — it was so peculiarly personal a popularity, his name being endeared to the vast majority who read his books with nothing less than affectionate admiration.

Besides all this, it was his privilege throughout the whole of his literary career to address not one class, or two or three classes, but all classes of the reading public indiscriminately — the most highly educated and the least educated, young and old, rich and poor. His writings obtained the widest circulation, of course, among those who were the most numerous, such as among the middle classes and the better portion of the artisan population, but they found at the same time the keenest and cordiallest appreciation among those who were necessarily the best qualified to pronounce an opinion upon their merits, among critics as gifted as Jeffrey and Sydney Smith, and among rivals as illustrious as Lytton and Thackeray. It seems appropriate, therefore, that we should be enabled to add now, in regard to the possession of this exceptional reputation, and of a popularity in itself so instant, sustained, personal, and comprehensive, that, thanks entirely to these Readings, he was brought into more intimate relations individually with a considerable portion at least of the vast circle of his own readers, than have ever been established between any other author who could be named and his readers, since literature became a profession.

Strictly speaking, the very first Reading given by Charles Dickens anywhere, even privately, was that which took place in the midst of a little home-group, assembled one evening in 1843, for the purpose of hearing the "Christmas Carol," prior to its publication, read by him in the Lincoln's-Inn Square Chambers of the intimate friend to whom, eighteen years afterwards, was inscribed, as "of right," the Library Edition of all the Novelist's works collectively. Thus unwittingly, and as it seems to us not unbefittingly, was rehearsed on the hearth of Dickens's future biographer, the first of the long series of Readings, afterwards to be given very publicly indeed, and to vast multitudes of people on both sides of the Atlantic.

As nearly as possible ten years after this, the public Readings commenced, and during the five next years were continued, though they were so but very intermittingly. Throughout that interval they were invariably given for the benefit of others, the proceeds of each Reading being applied to some generous purpose, the nature of which was previously announced. It was in the Town Hall at Birmingham, that immediately before the Christmas of 1853, the first of all these public Readings took place in the presence of an audience numbering fully two thousand. About a year before that, the Novelist had pledged himself to give this reading, or rather a series of three readings, for the purpose of increasing the funds of a new Literary and Scientific Institution then projected in Birmingham. On Thursday, the 6th of January, 1853, a silver-gilt salver and a diamond ring, accompanied by an address, expressive of the admiration of the subscribers to the testimonial, had been publicly presented in that town to the popular author, at the rooms of the Society of Arts in Temple Row. The kind of feeling inspiring this little incident may be recognised through the inscription on the salver, which intimated that it, “together with a diamond ring, was presented to Charles Dickens, Esq., by a number of his admirers in Birmingham, on the occasion of the literary and artistic banquet in that town, on the 6th of January, 1853, as a sincere testimony of their appreciation of his varied literary acquirements, and of the genial philosophy and high moral teaching which characterise his writings.” It was upon the morrow of the banquet referred to in this inscription, a banquet which took place at Dee’s Hotel immediately after the presentation of the testimonial to the Novelist, that the latter generously proposed to give later on some public Readings from his own books, in furtherance of the newly meditated Birmingham and Midland Institute.

The proposition, in fact, was thrown out, gracefully and almost apologetically, in a letter, addressed by him to Mr. Arthur Ryland on the following day, the 7th of January. In this singularly interesting communication, which was read by its recipient on the ensuing Monday, at a meeting convened in the theatre of the Philosophical Institution, not only did Charles Dickens offer to read his “Christmas Carol” some time during the course of the next Christmas, in the Town Hall at Birmingham, but referring to the complete novelty of his proposal, he thus plainly intimated that the occasion would constitute his very first appearance upon any public platform as a Reader, while explaining, at the same time, the precise nature of the suggested entertainment. “It would,” he said, “take about two hours, with a pause of ten minutes half-way through. There would be some novelty in the thing, as I have never done it in public, though I have in private, and (if I may say so) with a great effect on the hearers.” He further remarked, “I was so inexpressibly gratified last night by the warmth and enthusiasm of my Birmingham friends, that I feel half ashamed this morning of so poor an offer: but as I decided on making it to you before I came down yesterday, I propose it nevertheless.” As a matter of course the proposition was gratefully accepted, the Novelist formally undertaking to give the proffered Readings in the ensuing Christmas. This promise, before the year was out, Dickens returned from abroad expressly to fulfil — hastening homeward to that end, after a brief autumnal excursion in Italy and Switzerland with two of his friends, the late Augustus Egg, R. A., and Wilkie Collins, the novelist. On the arrival of the three in Paris, they were there joined by Charles Dickens’s eldest son, who, having passed through his course at Eton, had just then been completing his scholastic education at Leipsic. The party thus increased to a partie carrée, hastened homewards more hurriedly than would otherwise have been necessary, so as to enable the author punctually to fulfil his long-standing engagement.

It was on Tuesday, the 27th of December, 1853, therefore, that the very first of these famous Readings came off in the Town Hall at Birmingham. The weather was wretched, but the hall was crowded, and the audience enthusiastic. The Reading, which was the “Christmas Carol,” extended over more than three hours altogether, showing how very little of the original story the then unpractised hand of the Reader had as yet eliminated. Notwithstanding the length of the entertainment, the unflagging interest, more even than the hearty and reiterated applause of those who were assembled, showed the lively sense the author’s first audience had of his newly-revealed powers as a narrator and impersonator. On the next day but one, Thursday, the 29th of December, he read there, to an equally large concourse, the “Cricket on the Hearth.” Upon the following evening, Friday, the 30th of December, he repeated the “Carol” to another densely packed throng of listeners, mainly composed, this time, according to his own express stipulation, of workpeople. So delighted were these unsophisticated hearers with their entertainer — himself so long familiarly known to them, but then for the first time seen and heard — that, at the end of the Reading, they greeted him with repeated rounds of cheering.

Those three Readings at Birmingham added considerably to the funds of the Institute, enhancing them at least to the extent of £400 sterling. In recognition of the good service thus effectively and delightfully rendered to a local institution, to the presidency of which Charles Dickens himself was unanimously elected, an exquisitely designed silver flower-basket was afterwards presented to the novelist’s wife. This graceful souvenir had engraved upon it the following inscription: “Presented to Mrs. Charles Dickens by the Committee of the Birmingham and Midland Institute, as a slight acknowledgment of the debt of gratitude due to her husband, for his generous liberality in reading the ‘Christmas Carol,’ and the ‘Cricket on the Hearth,’ to nearly six thousand persons, in the Town Hall, Birmingham, on the nights-of December 27, 29, and 30, 1853, in aid of the funds for the establishment of the Institute.” The incident of these three highly successful Readings entailed upon the Reader, as events proved, an enormous amount of toil, none of which, however, did he ever grudge, in affording the like good service to others, at uncertain intervals, in all parts, sometimes the remotest parts, of the United Kingdom.

It would be beside our present purpose to catalogue, one after another, the various Readings given in this-way by the Novelist, before he was driven to the necessity at last of either giving up reading altogether, or coming to the determination to adopt it, as he then himself expressed it, as one of his recognised occupations; that is, by becoming a Reader professionally.. It is with his career in his professional capacity as a Reader that we have here to do. Until he had formally and avowedly assumed that position, his labours in this way were, as a matter of course, in no respect whatever systematised. They were uncertain, and in one sense, as the sequel shewed, purely tentative or preliminary. They yielded a world of delight, however, and did a world of good at the same time; while they were, unconsciously to himself, preparing the way effectually — that is, by ripening his powers and perfecting his skill through practice — for the opening up to himself, quite legitimately, of a new phase in his career as a man of letters. Previously, again and again, with the pen in his hand, he had proved himself to be the master-humorist of his time. He was now vividly to attest that fact by word of mouth, by the glance of his eye, by the application to the reading of his own books, of his exceptional mimetic and histrionic gifts as an elocutionist. Added to all this, by merely observing how readily he could pour through the proceeds of these purely benevolent Readings, princely largess into the coffers of charities or of institutions in which he happened to be interested, he was to realise, what must otherwise have remained for him wholly unsuspected, that he had, so to speak, but to stretch forth his hand to grasp a fortune.

During the lapse of five years all this was at first very gradually, but at last quite irresistibly, brought home to his conviction. A few of the Readings thus given by him, out of motives of kindness or generosity, may here, in passing, be particularised.

A considerable time after the three Readings just mentioned, and which were distinctly inaugurative of the whole of our author's reading career, there was one, which came off in Peterborough, that has not only been erroneously described as antecedent to those three Readings at Birmingham, but has been depicted, at the same time, with details in the account of it of the most preposterous character. The Reader, for example, has been portrayed, — in this purely apocryphal description of what throughout it is always referred to as though it were the first Reading of all, which it certainly was not, — as in a highly nervous state from the commencement of it to its conclusion! This being said of one who, when asked if he ever felt nervous while speaking in public, is known to have replied, “Not in the least “ — adding, that “when first he took the chair he felt as much confidence as though he had already done the like a hundred times!” As corroborative of which remark, the present writer recalls to recollection very clearly the fact of Dickens saying to him one day, — saying it with a most whimsical air by-the-bye, but very earnestly, — “Once, and but once only in my life, I was — frightened!” The occasion he referred to was simply this, as he immediately went on to explain, that somewhere about the middle of the serial publication of David Copperfield, happening to be out of writing-paper, he sallied forth one morning to get a fresh supply at the stationer’s. He was living then in his favourite haunt, at Fort House, in Broadstairs. As he was about to enter the stationer’s shop, with the intention of buying the needful writing-paper, for the purpose of returning home with it, and at once setting to work upon his next number, not one word of which was yet written, he stood aside for a moment at the threshold to allow a lady to pass in before him. He then went on to relate — with a vivid sense still upon him of mingled enjoyment and dismay in the mere recollection — how the next instant he had overheard this strange lady asking the person behind the counter for the new green number. When it was handed to her, “Oh, this,” said she, “I have read. I want the next one.” The next one she was thereupon told would be out by the end of the month. “Listening to this, unrecognised,” he added, in conclusion, “knowing the purpose for which I was there, and remembering that not one word of the number she was asking for was yet written, for the first and only time in my life, I felt — frightened!” So much for the circumstantial account put forth of this Reading at Peterborough, and of the purely imaginary nervousness displayed by the Reader, who, on the contrary, there, as elsewhere, was throughout perfectly self-possessed.

On Saturday, the 22nd December, 1855, in the Mechanics’ Hall at Sheffield, another of these Readings was given, it being the “Carol,” as usual, and the proceeds being in aid of the funds of that institution. The Mayor of Sheffield, who presided upon the occasion, at the close of the proceedings, presented to the author, as a suitable testimonial from a number of his admirers in that locality, a complete set of table cutlery.

An occasional Reading, moreover, was given at Chatham, to assist in defraying the expenses of the Chatham, Rochester, Strood, and Brompton Mechanics' Institution, of which the master of Gadshill was for thirteen years the President. His titular or official connection with this institute, in effect, was that of Perpetual President. His interest in it in that character ceased only with his life. Throughout the whole of the thirteen years during which he presided over its fortunes, he was in every imaginable way its most effective and energetic supporter. Six Readings in all were given by him at the Chatham Mechanics' Institution, in aid of its funds. The first, which was the "Christmas Carol," took place on the 27th December, 1857, the new Lecture Hall, which was appropriately decorated with evergreens and brilliantly illuminated, being crowded with auditors, conspicuous among whom were the officers of the neighbouring garrison and dockyard. The second, which consisted of "Little Dombey" and "The Trial Scene from Pickwick," came off on the 29th December, 1858. Long before any arrangement had been definitively made in regard to this second Reading, the local newspaper, in an apparently authoritative paragraph, announced, "on the best authority," that another Reading was immediately to be given, by Mr. Dickens, in behalf of the Mechanics' Institution. It is characteristic of him that he, thereupon, wrote to the Chatham newspaper, "I know nothing of your 'best authority,' except that he is (as he always is) preposterously and monstrously wrong." Eventually this Reading was arranged for, nevertheless, and came off at the date already mentioned. A third Reading at Chatham, comprising within it "The Poor Traveller" (the opening of which had a peculiar local interest), "Boots" at the "Holly Tree Inn," and "Mrs. Gamp," took place in 1860, on the 18th December. A fourth was given there on the 16th January, 1862, when the Novelist read his six selected chapters from "David Copperfield." A fifth, consisting of "Nicholas Nickleby at Dotheboys Hall," and "Mr. Bob Sawyer's-Party," took place in 1863, on the 15th December. Finally, there came off the sixth of these Chatham readings, on the 19th December, 1865, when the "Carol" was repeated, with the addition of the great case of "Bardell versus Pickwick." Upwards of £400 were thus, as the fruit of these exhilarating entertainments, poured into the coffers of the Chatham Institute. It can hardly be wondered at that, in the annual reports issued by the committee, emphatic expression should have been more than once given to the deep sense of gratitude entertained by them for the services rendered to the institution by its illustrious president—A fragmentary portion of that issued by the committee in the January of 1864 — referring, as it does, to—Charles Dickens, in association with his home and his favourite haunts down at Gadshill — we are here tempted to give, as indicative of the feelings of pride and admiration with which the great author was regarded by his own immediate neighbours. After referring to the large sums realised for the institution through the Readings thus generously given by its president, the committee went on to say in this report, at the beginning of 1864, “Simply to have the name of one whose writings have become household words at every home and hearth where the English language is spoken, associated with their efforts for the public entertainment and improvement, must be considered a great honour and advantage. But, when to this is added the large pecuniary assistance derived from such a connection, your committee find that they — and, of course, the members whom they represent — owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Dickens, which words can but poorly express. They trust that the home which he now occupies in the midst of the beautiful woodlands of Kent, and so near to the scene of his boyish memories and associations, may long be to him one of happiness and prosperity. If Shakspeare, our greatest national poet, had before made Gadshill a classic spot, surely it is now doubly consecrated by genius since Dickens, the greatest and most genial of modern humorists, as well as one of the most powerful and pathetic delineators of human character, has fixed his residence there. To those who have so often and so lately been moved to laughter and tears by the humour and pathos of the inimitable writer and reader, and who have profited by his gratuitous services to the institution, your committee feel that they need make no apology for dwelling at some length upon this most agreeable part of their report.” Thus profound were the feelings of respect, affection, and admiration with which the master-humorist was regarded by those who lived, and who were proud of living, in his own immediate neighbourhood.

On the evening of Tuesday, the 30th June, 1857, Charles Dickens read for the first time in London, at the then St. Martin’s Hall, now the Queen’s Theatre, in Long Acre. The occasion was one, in many respects, of peculiar interest. As recently as on the 8th of that month, Douglas Jerrold had breathed his last, quite unexpectedly. Dying in the fulness of his powers, and at little more than fifty years of age, he had passed away, it was felt, prematurely. As a tribute of affection to his memory, and of sympathy towards his widow and orphan children, those among his brother authors who had been more intimately associated with him in his literary career, organised, in the interests of his bereaved family, a series of entertainments. And in the ordering of the programme it was so arranged that this earliest metropolitan reading of one of his smaller works by Charles Dickens should be the second of these entertainments. Densely crowded in every part, St. Martin's Hall upon this occasion was the scene of as remarkable a reception and of as brilliant a success as was in any way possible. It was a wonderful success financially. As an elocutionary — or, rather, as a dramatic — display, it was looked forward to with the liveliest curiosity. The author's welcome when he appeared upon the platform was of itself a striking attestation of his popularity.

- Upwards of fourteen years have elapsed since the occasion referred to,
- yet we have still as vividly in our remembrance, as though it were but
- an incident of yesterday, the enthusiasm of the reception then accorded
- to the great novelist by an audience composed, for the most part,
- of representative Londoners. The applause with which he was greeted,
- immediately upon his entrance, was so earnestly prolonged and sustained,
- that it threatened to postpone the Reading indefinitely. Silence having
- at last been restored, however, the Reader's voice became audible in the
- utterance of these few and simple words, by way of preliminary: —
- "Ladies and gentlemen, I have the honour to read
- "to you 'A Christmas Carol,' in four staves. Stave
- "one, 'Marley's Ghost.'"

The effect, by the way, becoming upon the instant rather incongruous, as the writer of this very well remembers, when, through a sudden and jarring recollection of what the occasion was that had brought us all together, the Reader began, with a serio-comic inflection, "Marley was dead: to begin with. There's no doubt whatever about that. The register of his burial was signed." And so on through those familiar introductory sentences, in which Jacob Marley's demise is insisted upon with such ludicrous particularity. The momentary sense of incongruity here referred to was lost, however, directly afterwards, as everyone's attention became absorbed in the author's own relation to us of his world-famous ghost-story of Christmas.

Whereas the First Reading of the tale down in the provinces had occupied three hours in its delivery, the First Reading of it in the metropolis had been; diminished by half an hour. Beginning at 8 p.m., and ending at very nearly 10.30 p. m., with merely five minutes' interruption about midway, the entertainment so enthralled and delighted the audience throughout, that its close, after two hours and a half of the keenest attention, was the signal for a long outburst of cheers, mingled with the waving of hats and handkerchiefs. The description of the scene there witnessed is in noway exaggerated. It is the record of our own remembrance.

And the enthusiasm thus awakened among Charles Dickens's first London audience can hardly be wondered at, when we recall to mind Thackeray's expression of opinion in regard to that very same story of the Christmas Carol immediately after its publication, when he wrote in Fraser, July, 1844, under his pseudonym of M. A. Titmarsh: "It seems to me a national benefit, and to every man and woman who-reads it a personal kindness;" adding, "The last two people I heard speak of it were women; neither knew the other, or the author, and both said, by way of criticism, 'God bless him!'" Precisely in the same way, it may here be said, in regard to that first night of his own public reading of it in St. Martin's Hall, that there was a genial grasp of the hand in the look of every kind face then turned towards the platform, and a "God bless him" in every one of the ringing cheers that accompanied his departure.

A Reading of the "Carol" was given by its author in the following December down at Coventry, in aid of the funds of the local institute. And about a twelvemonth afterwards, on the 4th of December, 1858, in grateful acknowledgment of what was regarded in those cases always as a double benefaction (meaning the Reading itself and its golden proceeds), the novelist was entertained at a public banquet, at the Castle Hotel, Coventry, when a gold watch was presented to him as a testimonial of admiration from the leading inhabitants.

Finally, as the last of all these non-professional readings by our author, there was given on Friday the 26th of March, 1858, a reading of the "Christmas Carol," in the Music Hall at Edinburgh. His audience consisted of the members of, or subscribers to, the Philosophical Institution. At the close of the evening the Lord Provost, who had been presiding, presented to the Reader a massive and ornate silver wassail bowl. Seventeen years prior to that, Charles Dickens had been publicly entertained in Edinburgh, — Professor Wilson having been the chairman of the banquet given then in his honour. He had been at that time enrolled a burgess and guildbrother of the ancient corporation of the metropolis of Scotland. He had, among other incidents of a striking character marking his reception there at the same period, seen, on his chance entrance into the theatre, the whole audience rise spontaneously in recognition of him, the musicians in the orchestra, with a courtly felicity, striking up the cavalier air of "Charley is my Darling." If only out of a gracious remembrance of all this, it seemed not inappropriate that the very last of the complimentary readings should have been given by the novelist at Edinburgh, and that the Lord Provost of Edinburgh should, as if by way of stirrup-cup, have handed to the Writer and Reader of the "Carol," that souvenir from its citizens, in honour of the author himself and of his favourite theme, Christmas.

It was in connection with the organisation of the series of entertainments, arranged during the summer of 1857, in memory of Jerrold, and in the interests of Jerrold's family, that the attention of Charles Dickens was first of all awakened to a recognition of the possibility that he might, with good reason, do something better than carry out his original intention, that, namely, of dropping these Readings altogether, as simply exhausting and unremunerative. He had long since come to realise that it could in no conceivable way whatever derogate from the dignity of his position as an author, to appear thus in various parts of the United Kingdom, before large masses of his fellow-countrymen, in the capacity of a Public Reader. His so appearing was a gratification to himself as an artist, and was clearly enough also a gratification to his hearers, as appreciators of his twofold art, both as Author and as Reader. He perceived clearly enough, therefore, that his labours in those associated capacities were perfectly compatible; that, in other words, he might, if he so pleased, quite reasonably accept the duties devolving upon him as a Reader, as among his legitimate avocations.

Conspicuous among those who had shared in the getting up of the Jerrold entertainments — including among them, as we have seen, the first of his own Readings in London — the novelist had especially observed the remarkable skill or aptitude, as a general organiser, manifested from first to last by the Honorary Secretary, into whose hands, in point of fact, had fallen the responsibility of the entire management. This Honorary Secretary was no other than Albert Smith's brother Arthur — one who was not only the right-hand, as it were, of the Ascender of Mont Blanc, and of the Traveller in China, but who (behind the scenes, and unknown to the public) was the veritable wire-puller, prompter, Figaro, factotum of that farceur. among story-tellers, and of that laughter-moving patterer among public entertainers. Arthur Smith, full of resource, of contrivance, and of readiness, possessed in fact all the qualifications essential to a rapid organiser. He was, of all men who could possibly have been hit upon, precisely the very one to undertake in regard to an elaborate enterprise, like that of a long series of Readings in the metropolis, and of a comprehensive tour of Readings in the provinces, the responsible duties of its commercial management. Brought together accidentally at the time of the Jerrold testimonial, the Honorary Secretary of the fund and the Author-reader of the "Carol" came, as it seems now, quite naturally, to be afterwards intimately associated with one another, more in connection with the scheme of professional Readings, which reasonably grew up at last out of the previous five years' Readings, of a purely complimentary character.

Altogether, as has been said on an earlier page, Charles Dickens cannot have given less than some Five Hundred Readings. As a professional Reader alone he gave considerably over Four Hundred. Beginning in the spring of 1858, and ending in the spring of 1870, his career in that capacity extended at intervals over a lapse of twelve years: those twelve years embracing within them several distinct tours in England, Ireland, and Scotland, and in the United States; and many either entirely distinct or carefully interwoven series in London at St. Martin's Hall, at the Hanover Square Rooms, and at St. James's Hall, Piccadilly.

The first series in the metropolis, and the first tour in the United Kingdom, were made in 1858, under Mr. Arthur Smith's management. The second provincial tour, partly in 1861, partly in 1862, and two sets of readings in London, one at the St. James's Hall in 1862, the other at the Hanover Square Rooms in 1863, took place under Mr. Thomas Headland's management. As many as four distinct, and all of them important tours, notably one on the other side of the Atlantic, were carried out between 1866 and 1869, both years inclusive, under Mr. George Dolby's management. As showing at once the proportion of the enormous aggregate of 423 Readings, with which these three managers were concerned, it may be added here that while the first-mentioned had to do with 111, and the second with 70, the third and last-mentioned had to do with as many as 242 altogether.

It was on the evening of Thursday, the 29th of April, 1858, that Charles Dickens first made his appearance upon a platform in a strictly professional character as a public Reader. Although, hitherto, he had never once read for himself, he did so then avowedly — not merely by printed announcement beforehand, but on addressing himself by word of mouth to the immense audience assembled there in St. Martin's Hall. The Reading selected for the occasion was "The Cricket on the Hearth," but before its commencement, the author spoke as follows, doing so with well remembered clearness of articulation, as though he were particularly desirous that every word should be thoroughly weighed by his hearers, and taken to heart, by reason of their distinctly explaining the relations in which he and they would, thenceforth stand towards each other: —

- "Ladies and Gentlemen, — It may, perhaps, be
- "known to you that, for a few years past I have been
- "accustomed occasionally to read some of my shorter
- "books to various audiences, in aid of a variety of
- "good objects, and at some charge to myself both in
- "time and money. It having at length become im-
- "possible in any reason to comply with these always
- "accumulating demands, I have had definitely to
- "choose between now and then reading on my own
- "account as one of my recognised occupations, or not
- "reading at all. I have had little or no difficulty in
- "deciding on the former course.
- "The reasons that have led me to it — besides the
- "consideration that it necessitates no departure what-
- "ever from the chosen pursuits of my life — are three-
- "fold. Firstly, I have satisfied myself that it can
- "involve no possible compromise of the credit and

- "independence of literature. Secondly, I have long
- "held the opinion, and have long acted on the opinion,
- "that in these times whatever brings a public man
- "and his public face to face, on terms of mutual con- "fidence and respect, is a good thing. Thirdly, I - "have had a pretty large experience of the interest
- "my hearers are so generous as to take in these occa-
- "sions, and of the delight they give to me, as a tried
- "means of strengthening those relations, I may
- "almost say of personal friendship, which it is my
- "great privilege and pride, as it is my great respon- "sibility, to hold with a multitude of persons who will
- "never hear my voice, or see my face.
- "Thus it is that I come, quite naturally, to be here
- "among you at this time. And thus it is that I pro- "ceed to read this little book, quite as composedly as
- "I might proceed to write it, or to publish it in any
- "other way."

Remembering perfectly well, as we do, the precision with which he uttered every syllable of this little address, and the unmistakable cordiality with which its close was greeted, we can assert with confidence that Reader and Audience from the very first instant stood towards each other on terms of mutually respectful consideration. Remembering perfectly well, as we do, moreover, the emotion with which his last words were articulated and listened to on the occasion of his very last or Farewell Reading in the great hall near Piccadilly — and more than two thousand others must still perfectly well remember that likewise — we may no less confidently assert that those feelings had known no abatement, but on the contrary, had, during the lapse of many delightful years, come to be not only confirmed but intensified.

Sixteen Readings were comprised in that first series in London, at St. Martin's Hall. Inaugurated, as we have seen, on the 29th of April, 1858, the series was completed on the 22nd of the ensuing July. It may here be interesting to mention that, midway in the course of these Sixteen Readings, he gave for the first time in London, on Thursday the 10th of June, "The Story of Little Dombey," and on the following Thursday, the 17th of June, also for the first time in London, "The Poor Traveller," "Boots at the Holly Tree Inn," and "Mrs. Gamp." Whatever the subject of the Reading, whatever the state of the weather, the hall was crowded in every part, from the stalls to the galleries. Eleven days after the London season closed, the Reader and his business manager began their enormous round of the provinces.

As many as Eighty-Seven Readings were given in the course of this one provincial excursion. The first took place on Monday, the 2nd of August, at Clifton; the last on Saturday, the 13th of November, at Brighton. The places visited in Ireland included Dublin and Belfast, Cork and Limerick. Those traversed in Scotland comprised Edinburgh and Dundee, Aberdeen, Perth, and Glasgow. As for England, besides the towns already named, others of the first importance were taken in quick succession, an extraordinary amount of rapid railway travelling being involved in the punctual carrying out of the prescribed programme. However different in their general character the localities might be, the Readings somehow appeared to have some especial attraction for each, whether they were given in great manufacturing towns, like Manchester or Birmingham; in fashionable watering-places, like Leamington or Scarborough; in busy outports, like Liverpool or Southampton; in ancient cathedral towns, like York or Durham, or in seaports as removed from each other, as Plymouth and Portsmouth. Localities as widely separated as Exeter from Harrogate, as Oxford from Halifax, or as Worcester from Sunderland, were visited, turn by turn, at the particular time appointed. In a comprehensive round, embracing within it Wakefield and Shrewsbury, Nottingham and Leicester, Derby and Ruddersfield, the principal great towns were taken one after another. At Hull and Leeds, no less than at Chester and Bradford, as large and enthusiastic audiences were gathered together as, in their appointed times also were attracted to the Readings, in places as entirely dissimilar as Newcastle and Darlington, or as Sheffield and Wolverhampton.

The enterprise was, in its way, wholly unexampled. It extended over a period of more than three months altogether. It brought the popular author for the first time face to face with a multitude of his readers in various parts of the three kingdoms. And at every place, without exception throughout the tour, the adventure was more than justified, as a source of artistic gratification alike to himself and to his hearers, no less than as a purely commercial undertaking, the project throughout proving successful far beyond the most sanguine anticipations. Though the strain upon his energies, there can be no doubt of it, was very considerable, the Reader had brought vividly before him in recompense, on Eighty-Seven distinct occasions, the most startling proofs of his popularity — the financial results, besides this, when all was over, yielding substantial evidence of his having, indeed, won “golden opinions” from all sorts of people.

His provincial tour, it has been seen, closed at Brighton on the 13th of November. Immediately after this, it was announced that three Christmas Readings would be given in London at St. Martin’s Hall — the first and second on the Christmas Eve and the Boxing Day of 1858, those being respectively Friday and Monday, and the third on Twelfth Night, Thursday, the 6th of January, 1859. Upon each of these occasions the “Christmas Carol” and the “Trial from Pickwick,” were given to audiences that were literally overflowing, crowds of applicants each evening failing to obtain admittance. In consequence of this, three other Readings were announced for Thursday, the 13th, for Thursday, the 20th, and for Friday, the 28th of January — the “Carol” and “Trial” being fixed for the last time on the 13th; the Reading on the second of these three supplementary nights being “Little Dombey” and the “Trial from Pickwick;” the last of the three including within it, besides the “Trial,” “Mrs. Gamp” and the “Poor Traveller.” As affording conclusive proof of the sustained success of the Readings as a popular entertainment, it may here be added that advertisements appeared on the morrow of the one last mentioned, to the effect that “it has been found unavoidable to appoint two more Readings of the ‘Christmas Carol’ and the ‘Trial from Pickwick’“ — those two, by the way, being, from first to last, the most attractive of all the Readings. On Thursday, the 3rd, and on Tuesday, the 8th of February, the two last of these supplementary Readings in London, the aggregate of which had thus been extended from Three to Eight, were duly delivered. And in this way were completed the 111 Readings already referred to as having been given under Mr. Arthur Smith’s management.

Upwards of two years and a half then elapsed without any more of the Readings being undertaken, either in the provinces or in the metropolis. During 1860, in fact, Great Expectations was appearing from week to week in All the Year Round. And it was a judicious rule with our author — broken only at the last, and fatally, at the very end of his twofold career as Writer and as Reader — never to give a series of Readings while one of his serial stories was being produced. At length, however, in the late summer, or early autumn of 1861, the novelist was sufficiently free from literary preoccupations for another tour, and another series of Readings in London to be projected. The arrangements for each were sketched out by Mr. Arthur Smith, as the one still entrusted with the financial management of the undertaking. His health, however, was so broken by that time, that it soon became apparent that he could not reasonably hope to superintend in person the carrying out of the new enterprise. It was decided, therefore, provisionally, that Mr. Headland, who, upon the former occasion, had acted with him, should now, under his direction and as his representative, undertake the actual management. Before the projected tour of 1861 actually commenced, however, Mr. Arthur Smith had died, in September. The simply provisional arrangement lapsed in consequence, and upon Mr. Headland himself devolved the responsibility of carrying out the plans sketched out by his predecessor.

Although about the same time that had been allotted to the First Tour, namely a whole quarter, had been set apart for the Second, the latter included within it but very little more than half the number of Readings given in the earlier and more rapid round of the provinces. The Second Tour, in point of fact — beginning on Monday, the 28th of October, 1861, at Norwich, and terminating on Thursday, the 30th of January, 1862, at Chester — comprised within it Forty-Seven, instead of, as on the former occasion, Eighty-Seven readings altogether. Many of the principal towns and cities of England, not visited during the more comprehensive sweep made in 1858, through the three kingdoms, were now reached — the tour, this time, being restricted within the English boundaries. Lancaster and Carlisle, for example, Hastings and Canterbury, Ipswich and Colchester, were severally included in the new programme. Resorts of fashion, like Torquay and Cheltenham, were no longer overlooked. Preston in the north, Dover in the south, were each in turn the scene of a Reading. Bury St. Edmund's, in 1861, was reached on the 30th of October, and on the 25th of November an excursion was even made to the far-off border town of Berwick-upon-Tweed. Less hurried and less laborious than the first, this second tour was completed, as we have said, at Chester, just before the close of the first month of 1862, namely, on the 30th of January.

Then came the turn once more of London, where a series of Ten Readings was given in the St. James's Hall, Piccadilly. These ten Readings, beginning on Thursday, the 13th of March, were distributed over sixteen weeks, ending on Friday, the 27th of June. Another metropolitan series, still under Mr. Headland's management, was given as nearly as possible at the same period of the London season in the following twelvemonth. The Hanover Square Booms were the scene of these Readings of 1863, which began on Monday, the 2nd of March, and ended on Saturday, the 13th of June, numbering in all not ten, as upon the last occasion, but Thirteen.

During the winter of this year, Two notable Readings were given by the Novelist at the British Embassy, in Paris, their proceeds being devoted to the British Charitable Fund in that capital. These Readings were so brilliantly successful, that, by particular desire, they were, a little time afterwards, supplemented by a Third, which was quite as numerously attended as either of its predecessors. The audience upon each occasion, partly English, partly French, comprised among their number many of the most gifted and distinguished of the Parisians. These three entertainments were given under the immediate auspices of the Earl Cowley, then Her Majesty's ambassador to the court of Napoleon III.

A considerable interval now elapsed, extending in fact over nearly three years altogether, before the author again appeared upon the platform in his capacity as a Reader, either in London or in the Provinces. During his last provincial tour, there had been some confusion caused to the general arrangements by reason of the abrupt but unavoidable postponement of a whole week's Readings, previously announced as coming off, three of them at Liverpool, one at Chester, and two at Manchester. These six readings instead, however, of duly taking place, as originally arranged, between the 16th and the 21st of December, 1861, had to be given four weeks later on, between the 13th and the 30th of the following January. The disarrangement of the programme thus caused arose simply from the circumstance of the wholly unlooked-for and lamented death of H. E. H. the Prince Consort. Another confusion in the carefully prepared plans for one of the London series, again, had been caused by an unexpected difficulty, at the last moment, in securing the great Hall in Piccadilly, that having been previously engaged on the required evenings for a series of musical entertainments. Hence the selection for that season of the Hanover Square Rooms, which, at any rate for the West-end public, could not but be preferable to that earliest scene of the London Readings, St. Martin's Hall, Long Acre. Apart from every other consideration, however, the Novelist's remembrance of the confusions and disarrangements which had been incidental to his last provincial tour, and to the last series of his London Readings, rather disinclined him to hasten the date of his re-appearance in his character as a public Reader. As it happened, besides, after the summer of 1863, nearly two years elapsed, between the May of 1864 and the November of 1865, during which he was in a manner precluded from seriously entertaining any such project by the circumstance that the green numbers of "Our Mutual Friend" were, all that while, in course of publication. Even when that last of his longer serial stories had been completed, it is doubtful whether he would have cared to take upon himself anew the irksome stress and responsibility inseparable from one of those doubly laborious undertakings — a lengthened series of Readings in London, coupled with, or rather interwoven with, another extended tour through the provinces.

As it fortunately happened, however, very soon after the completion of "Our Mutual Friend," Charles Dickens had held out to him a double inducement to undertake once more the duties devolving upon him in his capacity as a Reader. The toil inseparable from the Readings themselves, as well as the fatigue resulting inevitably from so much rapid travelling hither and thither by railway during the period set apart for their delivery, would still be his. But at the least, according to the proposition now made to him, the Reader would be relieved from further care as to the general supervision, and at any rate, from all sense of responsibility in the revived project as a purely financial or speculative undertaking. The Messrs. Chappell, of New Bond Street, a firm skilled in the organizing of public entertainments of various kinds, chiefly if not exclusively until then, entertainments of a musical character, offered, in fact, in 1866 to assume to themselves thenceforth the whole financial responsibility of the Readings in the Metropolis and throughout the United Kingdom. According to the proposal originally submitted to the Novelist by the Messrs. Chappell, and at once frankly accepted by him, a splendid sum was guaranteed to him in remuneration. Twice afterwards those terms were considerably increased, — and upon each occasion, it should be added, quite spontaneously.

Another inducement was held out to the Reader besides that of his being relieved from all further sense of responsibility in the undertaking as a merely speculative enterprise. It related to the chance of his finding himself released also from any further sense of solicitude as to the conduct of the general business management. The inducement, here, however, was of course in no way instantly recognizable. Experience alone could show the fitness for his post of the Messrs. Chappell's representative. As good fortune would have it, nevertheless, here precisely was an instance in which Mr. Layard's famous phrase about the right man in the right place, was directly applicable. As a thoroughly competent business manager, and as one whose companionship of itself had a heartening influence in the midst of enormous toil, Mr. Dolby speedily came to be recognised as the very man for the position, as the very one who in all essential respects it was most desirable should have been selected.

A series of Thirty Readings was at once planned under his supervision. It consisted for the first time of a tour through England and Scotland, interspersed with Readings every now and then in the Metropolis. The Reader's course in this way seemed to be erratic, but the whole scheme was admirably well arranged beforehand, and once entered upon, was carried out with the precision of clockwork. These thirty Readings, in 1866, began and ended at St. James's Hall, Piccadilly. The opening night was that of Tuesday, the 10th of April, the closing night that of Tuesday, the 12th of June. Between those dates half-a-dozen other Readings were given from the same central platform in London, the indefatigable author making his appearance meanwhile alternately in the principal cities of the United Kingdom. Besides revisiting in this way (some of these places repeatedly) in the north, Edinburgh and Glasgow and Aberdeen, in the south and south-west, Clifton and Portsmouth, as well as Liverpool and Manchester intermediately — Charles Dickens during the course of this tour read for the first time at Bristol, at Greenwich, and in the Crystal Palace at Sydenham.

The inauguration of the series of Readings now referred to had a peculiar interest imparted to it by the circumstance that, on the evening of Tuesday, the 10th of April, 1866, there was first of all introduced to public notice the comic patter and pathetic recollections of the Cheap Jack, Doctor Marigold.

Half a year afterwards a longer series of the Readings began under the organisation of the Messrs. Chappell, and under the direction of Mr. Dolby as their business manager. It took place altogether under precisely similar circumstances as the last, with this only difference that the handsome terms of remuneration originally guaranteed to the author were, as already intimated, considerably and voluntarily increased by the projectors of the enterprise, the pecuniary results of the first series having been so very largely beyond their expectations. Fifty Readings instead of thirty were now arranged for — Ireland being visited as well as the principal towns and cities of England and Scotland. Six Readings were given at Dublin, and one at Belfast; four were given at Glasgow, and two at Edinburgh. Bath, for the first time, had the opportunity of according a public welcome to the great humorist, some of the drollest scenes in whose earliest masterpiece occur in the city of Bladud, as every true Pickwickian very well remembers. Then, also, for the first time, he was welcomed — by old admirers of his in his capacity as an author, new admirers of his thenceforth in his later and minor capacity as a Reader — at Swansea and Gloucester, at Stoke and Blackburn, at Hanley and Warrington. Tuesday, the 15th of January, 1867, was the inaugural night of the series, when “Barbox, Brothers,” and “The Boy at Mugby,” were read for the first time at St. James’s Hall, Piccadilly. Monday, the 13th of May, was the date of the last night of the season, which was brought to a close upon the same platform, the success of every Reading, without exception, both in London and in the provinces, having been simply unexampled.

It was shortly after this that the notion was first entertained by the Novelist of entering upon that Reading Tour in America, which has since become so widely celebrated. Overtures had been made to him repeatedly from the opposite shores of the Atlantic, with a view to induce him to give a course of Readings in the United States. Speculators would gladly, no doubt, have availed themselves of so golden an opportunity for turning to account his immense reputation. There were those, however, at home here, who doubted as to the advisability of the author entering, under any conceivable circumstances, upon an undertaking obviously involving in its successful accomplishment an enormous amount of physical labour and excitement. Added to this, the project was inseparable in any case — however favourable might be the manner of its ultimate arrangement — from a profound sense of responsibility all through the period that would have to be set apart for its realisation. It was among the more remarkable characteristics of Charles Dickens that, while he was endowed with a brilliant imagination, and with a genius in many ways incomparable, he was at the same time gifted with the clearest and soundest judgment, being, in point of fact, what is called a thoroughly good man of business. Often as he had shewn this to be the case during the previous phases of his career, he never demonstrated the truth of it so undeniably as in the instance of this proposed Reading Tour in the United States. Determined to understand at once whether the scheme, commended by some, denounced by others, was in itself, to begin with, feasible, and after that advisable, he despatched Mr. Dolby to America for the purpose of surveying the proposed scene of operations. Immediately on his emissary's return, Dickens drew up a few pithy sentences, headed by him, "The Case in a Nutshell." His decision was what those more immediately about him had for some time anticipated. He made up his mind to go, and to go quite independently. The Messrs. Chappell, it should be remarked at once, had no part whatever in the enterprise. The Author-Reader accepted for himself the sole responsibility of the undertaking. As a matter of course, he retained Mr. Dolby as his business manager, despatching him again across the Atlantic, when everything had been arranged between them, to the end that all should be in readiness by the time of his own arrival.

Within the brief interval which then elapsed, Between the business manager's return to, and the Author-Reader's departure for, America, that well-remembered Farewell Banquet was given to Charles Dickens, which was not unworthy of signalling his popularity and his reputation. He himself, upon the occasion, spoke of it as that "proud night," recognising clearly enough, as he could hardly fail to do, in the gathering around him, there in Freemasons' Hall, on the evening of the 2nd of November, 1867, one of the most striking incidents in a career that had been almost all sunshine, both from within and from without, from the date of its commencement. It was there, in the midst of what he himself referred to, at the time, as that "brilliant representative company," while acknowledging the presence around him of so many of his brother artists, "not only in literature, but also in the fine arts," he availed himself of the opportunity to relate very briefly the story of his setting out once more for America. "Since I was there before," he said, "a vast, entirely new generation has arisen in the United States. Since I was there before, most of the best known of my books have been written and published. The new generation and the books have come together and have kept together, until at last numbers of those who have so widely and constantly read me, naturally desiring a little variety in the relations between us, have expressed a strong wish that I should read myself. This wish at last conveyed to me, through public channels and business channels, has gradually become enforced by an immense accumulation of letters from individuals and associations of individuals, all expressing in the same hearty, homely, cordial, unaffected way a kind of personal interest in me; I had almost said a kind of personal affection for me, which I am sure you will agree with me, it would be dull insensibility on my part not to prize." Hence, as he explained, his setting forth on that day week upon his second visit to America, with a view among other purposes, according to his own happy phrase, to use his best endeavours "to lay down a third cable of intercommunication and alliance between the old world and the new." The illustrious chairman who presided over that Farewell Banquet, Lord Lytton, had previously remarked, speaking in his capacity as a politician, "I should say that no time could be more happily chosen for his visit;" adding, "because our American kinsfolk have conceived, rightly or wrongfully, that they have some cause of complaint against ourselves, and out of all England we could not have selected an envoy more calculated to allay irritation and to propitiate good will." As one whose cordial genius was, in truth, a bond of sympathy between the two great kindred nationalities, Charles Dickens indeed went forth in one sense at that time, it might almost have been said, in a semi-ambassadorial character, not between the rulers, but between the peoples. The incident of his visit to America could in no respect be considered a private event, but, from first to last, was regarded, and reasonably regarded, as a public and almost as an international occurrence. "Happy is the man," said Lord Lytton, on that 2nd of November, when proposing the toast of the evening in words of eloquence worthy of himself and of his theme, "Happy is the man who makes clear his title deeds to the royalty of genius, while he yet lives to enjoy the gratitude and reverence of those whom he has subjected to his sway. Though it is by conquest that he achieves his throne, he at least is a conqueror whom the conquered bless, and the more despotically he enthralls the dearer he becomes to the hearts of men." Observing, in conclusion, as to this portion of his argument, "Seldom, I say, has that kind of royalty been quietly conceded to any man of genius until his tomb becomes his throne, and yet there is not one of us now present who thinks it strange that it is granted without a murmur to the guest whom we receive to-night." As if in practical recognition of the prerogative thus gracefully referred to by his brother-author, a royal saloon carriage on Friday, the 8th of November, conveyed Charles Dickens from London to Liverpool. On the following morning he took his departure on board the

Cuba for the United States, arriving at Boston on Tuesday, the 19th, when the laconic message "Safe and well," was flashed home by submarine telegraph.

The Readings projected in America were intended to number up as many as eighty altogether. They actually numbered up exactly Seventy-Six. They were inaugurated by the first of the Boston Readings on Monday, the 2nd of December, 1867. Extending over an interval of less than five months, they closed in Steinway Hall on Monday, the 20th April, 1868, with the last of the New York Readings. From beginning to end, the enthusiasm awakened by these Readings was entirely unparalleled. Simply to ensure a chance of purchasing the tickets of admission, a queue of applicants a quarter of a mile long would pass a whole winter's night patiently waiting in sleet and snow, out in the streets, to be in readiness for the opening of the office-doors when the sale of tickets should have commenced. Blankets and in several instances mattresses were brought with them by some of the more provident of these nocturnal wayfarers, many of whom of course were notoriously middle-men who simply speculated, with immense profit to themselves, in selling again at enormously advanced prices the tickets which were invariably dispensed by the business manager at the fixed charges originally announced.

As curiously illustrative of the first outburst of this enthusiasm even before the Novelist's arrival — on the very eve of that arrival, as it happened — mention may here be made of the simple facts in regard to the sale of tickets on Monday, the 18th of November. During the whole of that day, from the first thing in the morning to the last thing at night, Mr. Dolby sat there at his desk in the Messrs. Ticknor and Fields' bookstore, literally doing nothing but sell tickets as fast as he could distribute them and take the money. For thirteen hours together, without taking bite or sup, without ever once for a passing moment quitting the office-stool on which he was perched — fortunately for him behind a strong barricade — he answered the rush of applicants that steadily pressed one another onwards to the pigeon-hole, each drifting by exhausted when his claims were satisfied. The indefatigable manager took in moneys paid down within those thirteen consecutive hours as many as twelve thousand dollars.

During the five months of his stay in America, four Readings a week were given by the Novelist to audiences as numerous as the largest building in each town of a suitable character could by any contrivance be made to contain. The average number of those present upon each of these occasions may be reasonably estimated as at the very least 1500 individuals. Remembering that there were altogether seventy-six Readings, this would show at once that upwards of one hundred thousand souls (114,000) listened to the voice of the great Author reading, what they had so often before read themselves, and raising their own voices in return to greet his ears with their ringing acclamations. At a moderate estimate, again, just as we have seen that each Reading represented 1500 as the average number of the audience, that audience represented, in its turn, in cash, at the lowest computation, nett proceeds amounting to fully $3000. At Rochester, for example, in the State of New York, was the smallest house anywhere met with in the whole course of these American Readings, and even that yielded $2500, the largest house in the tour, on the other hand, netting as much as $6000 and upwards. Multiplying, therefore, the reasonably-mentioned average of $3000 by seventy-six, as the aggregate number of the Readings, we arrive at the astounding result that in this tour of less than five months the Author-Reader netted altogether the enormous sum of $228,000. Supposing gold to have been then at par, that lump sum would have represented in our English currency what if spoken of even in a whisper would, according to Hood's famous witticism, have represented something like "the roar of a Forty Thousand Pounder!" Even as it was, then, gold being at 39 1/2 per cent, premium, with 1/4 per cent, more deducted on commission — virtually a drop of nearly 40 per cent, altogether! — the result was the winning of a fortune in what, but for the fatigue involved in it, might have been regarded as simply a holiday excursion.

The fatigue here referred to, however, must have been something very considerable. Its influence was felt all the more, no doubt, by reason of the Novelist having had to contend during upwards of four hard winter months, as he himself laughingly remarked just before his return homewards, with "what he had sometimes been quite admiringly assured, was a true American catarrh!" Nevertheless, even with its depressing and exhausting influence upon him, he not only contrived to carry out the project upon which he had adventured, triumphantly to its appointed close, but even upon one of the most inclement days of an unusually inclement season, namely, on Saturday, the 29th of February, 1868, he actually took part as one of the umpires in the good-humoured frolic of a twelve-mile walking match, up hill and down dale, through the snow, on the Milldam road, between Boston and Newton, doing every inch of the way, heel and toe, as though he had been himself one of the competitors. The first six miles having been accomplished by the successful competitor in one hour and twenty-three minutes, and the return six in one hour and twenty-five minutes, the Novelist — although, with his light, springy step, he had observantly gone the whole distance himself, as we have seen, in his capacity as umpire, — presided blithely, in celebration of this winter day's frolic, at a sumptuous little banquet, given by him at the Parker House, a banquet that Lucullus would hardly have disdained. Having appeared before his last audience in America on the 20th of April, 1868, at New York, the Author-Reader addressed through them to all his other auditors in the United States, after that final Reading was over, a few genial and generous utterances of farewell. Among other things, he said to them, — "The relations which have been set up between us, while they have involved for me something more than mere devotion to a task, have been sustained by you with the readiest sympathy and the kindest acknowledgment. Those relations must now be broken for ever. Be assured, however, that you will not pass from my mind. I shall often realise you as I see you now, equally by my winter fire, and in the green English summer weather. I shall never recall you as a mere audience, but rather as a host of personal friends, — and ever with the greatest gratitude, tenderness, and consideration." Two days before that last of all these American Readings, he had been entertained at a public banquet in New York, on the 18th of April, at Delmonico's. Two days after the final American Reading and address of farewell, he took his departure from New York on board the Russia, on Wednesday, the 22nd of April, arriving on Friday, the 1st of May, at Liverpool.

Scarcely a month had elapsed after his return homewards, when the prospective and definitive close of the great author's career as a public Reader was formally announced. Again the Messrs. Chappell, of New Bond Street, appeared between the Novelist and the public as intermediaries. They intimated through their advertisement, that "knowing it to be the determination of Mr. Dickens finally to retire from public Readings, soon after his return from America, they (as having been honoured with his confidence on former occasions) made proposals to him, while he was still in the United States achieving his recent brilliant successes there, for a final farewell series of Readings in this country." They added that "their proposals were at once accepted in a manner highly gratifying to them;" and that the series, which would commence in the ensuing autumn, would comprehend, besides London, several of the chief towns and cities of England, Ireland, and Scotland. Looking back to this preliminary advertisement now, there is a melancholy significance in the emphasis with which it was observed — "It is scarcely necessary to add that any announcement made in connection with these Farewell Readings will be strictly adhered to and considered final; and that on no consideration whatever will Mr. Dickens be induced to appoint an extra night in any place in which he shall have been announced to read for the last time." According to promise, in the autumn, these well-remembered Farewell Readings commenced. They were intended to run on to the number of one hundred altogether. Beginning within the first week of October, they were not to end until the third week of the ensuing May. As it happened, Seventy-Four Readings were given in place of the full hundred. On Tuesday, the 6th of October, 1868, the series was commenced. On Thursday, the 22nd of April, 1869, its abrupt termination was announced, by a telegram from Preston, that caused a pang of grief and anxiety to the vast multitude of those to whom the very name of Charles Dickens had, for more than thirty years, been endeared. The intimation conveyed through that telegram was the fact of his sudden and alarming illness. Already, in the two preceding months, though the public generally had taken no notice of the circumstance, three of the Readings had, for various reasons, been unavoidably given up — one at Hull, fixed for the 12th of March, and previously one at Glasgow, fixed for the 18th, and another at Edinburgh, fixed for the 19th of February. Otherwise than in those three instances, the sequence of Readings marked on the elaborate programme had been most faithfully adhered to; the Reader, indeed, only succumbing at last under the nervous exhaustion caused by his own indomitable perseverance.

It is, now, matter of all but absolute certainty that his immense energies, his elastic temperament, and his splendid constitution had all of them, long before this, been cruelly overtaxed and overweighted. Unsuspected by any of us at the time, he had, there can be little doubt of it, received the deadliest shock to his whole system as far back as on the 9th of June, 1865, in that terrible railway accident at Staplehurst, on the fifth anniversary of which fatal day, by a strange coincidence, he breathed his last. His intense vitality deceived himself and everybody else, however, until it was all too late. The extravagant toil he was going through for months together — whirling hither and thither in express trains, for the purpose of making one exciting public appearance after another, each of them a little world of animated impersonations — he accomplished with such unfailing and unflagging vivacity, with such an easy step, such an alert carriage, with such an animated voice and glittering eye, that for a long while at least we were under the illusion. Hurrying about England, Ireland, and Scotland as he was during almost the whole of the last quarter of 1868 and during the whole of the first quarter of 1869 — dividing his time not only between Liverpool and Manchester, Edinburgh and Glasgow, Dublin and Belfast, with continual returns to his central reading-platform in the great Hall near Piccadilly, but visiting afterwards as well nearly all the great manufacturing towns and nearly all the fashionable watering-places — the wonder is now not so much that he gave in at last to the exorbitant strain, but that he did not give in much sooner.

A single incident will suffice to show the pace at which he was going before the overwrought system gave the first sign of its being overwrought. On the evening of Thursday, the 11th of March, 1869, an immense audience crowded the Festival Concert Room at York, the people there having only that one opportunity of attending a Farewell Reading. As they entered the room, each person received a printed slip of paper, on which was read, “The audience are respectfully informed that carriages have been ordered tonight at half-past nine. Without altering his Reading in the least, Mr. Dickens will shorten his usual pauses between the Parts, in order that he may leave York by train a few minutes after that time. He has been summoned,” it was added, “to London, in connection with a late sad occurrence within the general knowledge, but a more particular reference to which would be out of place here.” His attendance, in point of fact, was suddenly required at the funeral of a dear friend of his in the metropolis. To the funeral he had to go. From the poignantly irksome duty of the Reading he could not escape. Giving the latter even as proposed, he would barely have time to catch the up express, so as to arrive in town by the aid of rapid night travelling, and be true to the melancholy rendezvous at the scene of his friend’s obsequies. The Readings that night were three, and they were given in rapid succession, the Reader, after the first and second, instead of withdrawing, as usual, for ten minutes’ rest into his retiring room at the back of the platform, merely stepping for an instant or two behind the screen at the side of the platform, putting his lips to some iced champagne, and stepping back at once to the reading-desk. The selected Readings were these — "Boots at the Holly-Tree Inn," the murder scene of "Sikes and Nancy," and the grotesque monologue of "Mrs. Gamp." The Archbishop and the other principal people of York were there conspicuously noticeable in the stalls, eagerly listening and keenly observant, evidently in rapt attention throughout the evening, but more especially during the powerfully acted tragic incident from "Oliver Twist." The Reading, as a whole, was more than ordinarily successful — parts of it were exceptionally impressive. Directly it was over, the Reader, having had a coupé previously secured for his accommodation in the express, was just barely enabled, at a rush, to catch the train an instant or so before its starting. Then only, after it had started, could he give a thought to his dress, changing his clothes and snatching a morsel of supper in the railway carriage as he whirled on towards London. The occasion referred to serves, at any rate, to illustrate the wear and tear to which the Author had rendered himself, through these Readings, more or less continually liable.

The jeopardy in which it placed his life at last was alarmingly indicated by the peremptory order of his medical adviser, Mr. Frank Beard, of Welbeck Street — immediately on his arrival in Preston on the 22nd of April, in answer to a telegram summoning him thither upon the instant from London — that the Readings must be stopped then and thenceforth. When this happened, a fortnight had not elapsed after the grand Banquet given in honour of Charles Dickens at St. George's Hall, in Liverpool. As the guest of the evening, he had, there and then, been "cheered to the echo" by seven hundred enthusiastic admirers of his presided over by the Mayor of Liverpool. That was on Saturday, the 10th of April, during a fortnight's blissful rest in the whirling round of the Readings. Immediately that fortnight was over, the whirling round began again its momentarily interrupted gyrations. Three days in succession there was a Reading at Leeds — on Thursday, the 15th, Friday, the 16th, and Saturday, the 17th of April. On Monday, the 19th, there was a Reading at Blackburn; on Tuesday, the 20th, another at Bolton; on Wednesday, the 21st, another at Southport. Then came the morning of the 22nd, on the evening of which Thursday he was to have read at Preston. By the then Dickens's medical adviser had arrived from London, the audience had already begun assembling. Thereupon, not only was that particular Reading prohibited, but, by the same wise mandate, all thought of resuming the course, or even a portion of it, afterwards, was as peremptorily interdicted. In one sense, it is only matter for wistful regret, now, that that judicious interdict was so far removed, three-quarters of a year afterwards, that the twelve Final Readings of Farewell which were given at the St. James' Hall in the spring of 1870, beginning on Tuesday, the 11th of January, and ending on Tuesday, the 15th of March, were' assented to as in any way reasonable.

That even these involved an enormous strain upon the system, was proved to absolute demonstration by the statistics jotted down with the utmost precision during the Readings, as to the fluctuations of the Reader's pulse immediately before and immediately after each of his appearances upon the platform, mostly two, but often three, appearances in a single evening. The acceleration of his pulse has, to our knowledge, upon some of these occasions been something extraordinary. Upon the occasion of his last and grandest Reading of the Murder, for example, as he stepped upon the platform, resolved, apparently, upon outdoing himself, he remarked, in a half-whisper to the present writer, just before advancing from the cover of the screen to the familiar reading-desk, "I shall tear myself to pieces." He certainly never acted with more impassioned earnestness — though never once, for a single instant, however, overstepping the boundaries of nature. His pulse just before had been tested, as usual, keenly and carefully, by his most sedulous and sympathetic medical attendant. It was counted by him just as keenly and carefully directly afterwards — the rise then apparent being something startling, almost alarming, as it seemed to us under the circumstances.

Those twelve Farewell Readings are all the more to be regretted now when we come to look back at them, on our recalling to remembrance the fact that then, for the first time since he assumed to himself the position of a Public Reader professionally, Dickens consented to give a series of Readings at the very period when he was producing one of his imaginative works in monthly instalments. He appeared to give himself no rest whatever, when repose, at any rate for a while, was most urgently required. He seemed to have become his own taskmaster precisely at the time when he ought to have taken the repose he had long previously earned, by ministering so largely and laboriously to the world's enjoyment.

Summing up in a few words what has already been related in detail, one passing sentence may here recall to recollection the fact, that in addition to the various works produced by the Novelist during the last three lustres of his energetic life as a man of letters, he had personally, within that busy interval of fifteen years, given in round numbers at a moderate computation some 500 of these Public Readings — 423 in a strictly professional capacity, the rest, prior to 1858, purely out of motives of generosity, in his character as a practical philanthropist. In doing this he had addressed as many as five hundred enormous audiences, whose rapt attention he had always secured, and who had one and all of them, without exception, welcomed his coming and going with enthusiasm. During this period he had travelled over many thousands of miles, by railway and steam-packet. In a single tour, that of the winter of 1867 and 1868, in America, he had appeared before upwards of 100,000 persons, earning, at the same time, over 200,000 dollars within an interval of very little more than four months altogether.

Later on, the circumstances surrounding the immediate close of this portion of the popular author's life, as a Public Reader of his own works, will be described when mention is made of his final appearance in St. James's Hall, on the night of his Farewell Reading. Before any particular reference is made, however, to that last evening, it may be advisable, as tending to make this record more complete, that there should now be briefly passed in review, one after another, those minor stories, and fragments of the larger stories, the simple recounting of which by his own lips yielded so much artistic delight to a great multitude of his contemporaries. Whatever may thus be remarked in regard to these Readings will be written at least from a vivid personal recollection; the writer, throughout, speaking, as before observed, from his intimate knowledge of the whole of this protracted episode in the life of the Novelist.

Whatever aid to the memory besides might have been thought desirable, he has had ready to hand all through, in the marked copies of the very books from which the author read upon these occasions, or from which, at the least, he had the appearance of reading. For, especially towards the last, Charles Dickens hardly ever glanced, even momentarily, at the printed pages, simply turning the leaves mechanically as they lay open before him on the picturesque little reading-desk. Besides the Sixteen Readings actually given, there were Four others which were so far meditated that they were printed separately as "Readings," though the reading copies of them that have been preserved, were never otherwise prepared by their authorcompiler for representation. One of these the writer remembers suggesting to the Novelist, as a characteristic companion or contrast to Dr. Marigold, — meaning “Mrs. Lirriper.” Another, strange to say, — about the least likely of all his stories one would have thought to have been thus selected, — was “The Haunted Man.” A third was “The Prisoner of the Bastile,” which would, for certain, have been one of Dickens’s most powerful delineations. The fourth, if only in remembrance of the Old Bailey attorney, Mr. Jaggers, of the convict Magwitch, and of Joe the blacksmith, the majority would probably have been disposed to regret almost more than Mrs. Lirriper. Though the lodging-house keeper would have been welcome, too, for her own sake, as who will not agree in saying, if merely out of a remembrance of the “trembling lip” put up towards her face, speaking of which the good motherly old soul exclaims, “and I dearly kissed it;” or, bearing in mind, another while, her preposterous reminiscence of the “impertinent little cock-sparrow of a monkey whistling with dirty shoes on the clean steps, and playing the harp on the area railings with a hoop-stick.” Actually given or only meditated, the whole of these twenty Readings — meaning the entire collection of the identical marked copies used by the Novelist himself on both sides of the Atlantic — have, for the verification of this retrospect, been placed for the time being in the writer’s possession. Selecting from among them those merely which are familiar to the public, from their having been actually produced, he here proposes cursorily to glance one by one through the well-known series of Sixteen.

THE CHRISTMAS CAROL.

It can hardly be any matter for wonder that the "Christmas Carol" was, among all the Readings, the author's own especial favourite! That it was so, he showed from first to last unmistakeably. He began with it in 1853, and ended with it in 1870, upon the latter occasion appending to the long since abbreviated narrative, that other incomparable evidence of his powers as a humorist, "The Trial from Pickwick." Whoever went for the first time to see and hear Charles Dickens read one or other of his writings, did well in selecting a night when he was going to relate his immortal ghost story of Christmas. In compliance with the well-known wish of the Novelist, the audience, as a rule, contrived to assemble and to have actually taken their places several minutes before the time fixed for the Reader's appearance upon the platform. Occasionally it happened, nevertheless, that a stray couple or so would be still drifting in, here and there, among the serried ranks of the stalls, when, book in hand, with a light step, a smile on his face, and a flower in his button-hole, the author had already rapidly advanced and taken his place before his quaintly constructed but graceful little reading-desk. Then it was, perhaps, at those very times, that a stranger to the whole scene regarded himself almost as under a personal obligation to these vexatious stragglers. For, until every one of them had quietly settled down, there stood the Novelist, cheerfully, patiently, glancing to the right and to the left, taking the bearings of his night's company, as one might say, with an air of the most perfect ease and self-possession. Whosoever, consequently, was in attendance there for the first time, had an opportunity, during any such momentary pause, of familiarising himself with the appearance of the famous writer, with whose books he had probably been intimately acquainted for years upon years previously, but whom until then he had never had the chance of beholding face to face.

Everyone, even to the illiterate wayfarers in the public streets, had, to a certain extent, long since come to know what manner of man Charles Dickens was by means of his widely-scattered photographs. But, there, better than any photograph, was the man himself, — the master of all English humorists, the most popular author during his own lifetime that ever existed; one whose stories for thirty years together had been read with tears and with laughter, and whose books had won for him personal affection, as well as fame and fortune. Anyone seeing him at those moments for the first time, would unquestionably think — How like he was to a very few indeed, how utterly unlike the vast majority of his countless cartes-de-visites! To the last there was the bright, animated, alert carriage of the head — phrenologically a noble head — physiognomically a noble countenance. Encountering him within a very few weeks of his death, Mr. Arthur Locker has said, “I was especially struck with the brilliancy and vivacity of his eyes:” adding, “there seemed as much life and animation in them as in twenty ordinary pairs of eyes.” Another keen observer, Mr. Arthur Helps, has in the same spirit exclaimed, “What portrait can do justice to the frankness, kindness, and power of his eyes?” None certainly that ever was painted by the pencil of the sunbeam, or by the brush of a Royal Academician. Fully to realise the capacity for indicating emotion latent in them, and informing his whole frame — his hands for example, in their every movement, being wonderfully expressive — those who attended these Readings soon came to know, that you had but to listen to his variable and profoundly sympathetic voice, and to watch the play of his handsome features.

The different original characters introduced in his stories, when he read them, he did not simply describe, he impersonated: otherwise to put it, for whomsoever he spoke, he spoke in character. Thus, when everything was quiet in the crowded assembly, and when the ringing applause that always welcomed his appearance, but which he never by any chance acknowledged, had subsided — when he began: “A Christmas Carol, in four staves. Stave one, Marley’s Ghost. Marley was dead to begin with.” Having remarked, yet further, that “there was no doubt whatever about that,” the register of his burial being signed by this functionary, that and the other — when he added, “Scrooge signed it; and Scrooge’s name was good upon ‘Change for anything he chose to put his hand to” — Scrooge in the flesh was, through the very manner of the utterance of his name, brought vividly and upon the instant before the observant listener. “Oh! but he was a tight-fisted hand at the grindstone, was Scrooge!” That we knew instinctively, without there being any need whatever for our hearing one syllable of the description of him, admirably given in the book, but suppressed in the Reading, judiciously suppressed enough, because, for that matter, we saw and heard it without any necessity for its being explained.

As one might say — quoting here a single morsel from the animated description of Scrooge, that was actually illustrated by Scrooge's impersonator — it all “spoke out shrewdly in his grating voice!” And it was thus, not merely with regard to the leading personages of the little acted drama, as, turn by turn, they were introduced; precisely the same artistic care was applied by the impersonating realist to the very least among the minor characters, filling in, so to speak, little incidental gaps in the background. A great fat man with a monstrous chin, for example, was introduced just momentarily in the briefest street-dialogue, towards the close of this very Reading, who had only to open his lips once or twice for an instant, yet whose individuality was in that instant or two so thoroughly realised, that he lives ever since then in the hearers' remembrance. When, in reply to some one's inquiry, as to what was the cause of Scrooge's (presumed) death? — this great fat man with the monstrous chin answered, with a yawn, in two words, “God knows!” — he was before us there, as real as life, as selfish, and as substantial. So was it also with the grey-haired rascal, Joe, of the rag-and-bottle shop; with Topper, when he pronounced himself, as a bachelor, to be “a wretched outcast;” with the Schoolmaster, when he “glared on Master Scrooge with ferocious condescension, and threw him into a dreadful state of mind by shaking hands with him,” all of whom were indicated by the merest touch or two, and yet each of whom was a living and breathing and speaking verisimilitude.

There was produced, to begin with, however, a sense of exhilaration in the very manner with which Dickens commenced the Reading of one of his stories, and which was always especially noticeable in the instance of this particular ghost story of his about Christmas. The opening sentences were always given in those cheery, comfortable tones, indicative of a double relish on the part of a narrator — to wit, his own enjoyment of the tale he is going to relate, and his anticipation of the enjoyment of it by those who are giving him their attention. Occasionally, at any rate during the last few years, his voice was husky just at the commencement, but as he warmed to his work, with him at all times a genuine labour of love, everything of that kind disappeared almost at the first turn of the leaf. The genial inflections of the voice, curiously rising, in those first moments of the Reading, at the end of every sentence, there was simply no resisting. Had there been a wedding guest present, he would hardly have repined in not being able to obey the summons of the loud bassoon. The narrator had his will with one and all.

However large and however miscellaneous the audience, from the front of the stalls to the back of the gallery, every one listened to the familiar words that fell from his lips, from the beginning to the end, with unflagging attention. There could be small room for marvel at this, however, in the instance of the “Carol,” on first reading which, Thackeray spoke of its author as that “delightful genius!” The Edinburgh editor, Lord Jeffrey, at the very same time, namely, towards the close of 1843, on the morrow of the little book’s original publication, avowing, in no less glowing terms, that he had been nothing less than charmed by the exquisite apologue: “chiefly,” as he declared, “for the genuine goodness which breathes all through it, and is the true inspiring angel by which its genius has been awakened.” Never since he had first — and that but a very few years previously — taken pen in hand as a story-teller, had this “delightful genius” sat down in a happier vein for writing anything, than when he did so for the purpose of recounting how Scrooge was converted, by a series of ghostly apparitions, from the error of his utterly selfish way in life, until then, as a tough-skinned, ingrained curmudgeon.

Characters and incidents, brought before us anew in the Reading, were all so cordially welcomed, — the former being such old friends, the latter so familiarly within our knowledge! Insomuch that many passages were, almost word for word, remembered by those who, nevertheless, listened as if curious to learn what might follow, yet who could readily, any one of them, have prompted the Reader, that is the Author himself, supposing by some rare chance he had happened, just for one moment, to be at fault. It is curious to observe, on turning over the leaves of the marked copy of this Reading, the sententious little marginal notes for his own guidance, jotted down by the hand of this wonderful master of elocutionary effect. “Narrative” is written on the side of p. 5 where Scrooge’s office, on Christmas Eve, is described, just before mention is made of the Clerk’s dismal little cell seeming to be “a sort of tank,” and of his fire being so small that it looked like “one coal,” and of his trying at last to warm himself by the candle, “in which effort, not being a man of strong imagination, he failed.” Again, “Cheerful” is penned on the side of p. 6, where Scrooge’s Nephew comes in at a burst with “A Merry Christmas, uncle! God save you!”

After Scrooge’s inhuman retort of “Bah! humbug!” not a word was added of the descriptive sentence immediately following. Admirable though every word of it is, however, one could hardly regret its suppression. Is it asked why? Well then, for this simple reason — the force of which will be admitted by anyone who ever had the happiness of grasping Charles Dickens's hand in friendship — that his description of Scrooge's Nephew was, quite unconsciously but most accurately, in every word of it, a literal description of himself, just as he looked upon any day in the blithest of all seasons, after a brisk walk in the wintry streets or on the snowy high road. "He had so heated himself with rapid walking in the fog and frost, this Nephew of Scrooge's, that he was all in a glow; his face was ruddy and handsome; his eyes sparkled, and his breath smoked again." The Novelist himself was depicted there to a nicety. No need, therefore, was there for even one syllable of this in the Reading. Scrooge's Nephew was visibly before us, without a word being uttered.

To our thinking, it has always seemed as if the one chink through which Scrooge's sympathies are got at and his heart-strings are eventually touched, is discernable in his keen sense of humour from the very outset. It is precisely through this that there seems hope, from the very beginning, of his proving to be made of "penetrable stuff." When, after his monstrous "Out upon merry Christmas!" he goes on to say, "If I had my will every idiot who goes about with 'merry Christmas' on his lips should be boiled with his own pudding and buried with a stake of holly in his heart: he should!" one almost feels as if he were laughing in his sleeve from the very commencement. Instance, as yet more strikingly to the point in respect to what we are here maintaining, the wonderfully comic effect of the bantering remarks addressed by him to the Ghost of Jacob Marley all through their confabulation, even when the spectre's voice, as we are told, was disturbing the very marrow in his bones. True, it is there stated that, all through that portentous dialogue, he was only trying to be smart "as a means of distracting his own attention." But the jests themselves are too delicious, one would say, for mere make-believes. Besides which, hear his laugh at the end of the book! Hardly that of one really so long out of practice — "a splendid laugh, a most illustrious laugh, the father of a long, long line of brilliant laughs!" A laugh, one might suppose, as contagious as that of his own Nephew when he was "so inexpressibly tickled that he was obliged to get up off the sofa and stamp!" Speaking of which our author writes so delectably, "If you should happen by any unlikely chance to know a man more blest in a laugh than Scrooge's Nephew, all I can say is, I should like to know him too. Introduce him to me, and I'll cultivate his acquaintance." At which challenge one might almost have been tempted anticipatively to say at a venture — Scrooge! Good-humoured argument apart, however, what creatures were those who, one by one — sometimes, it almost seemed, two or three of them together — appeared and disappeared upon the platform, at the Reader's own good-will and pleasure!

After Scrooge's "Good afternoon!" — delivered with irresistibly ludicrous iteration — we caught something more than a distant glimpse of the Clerk in the tank, when — on Scrooge's surly interrogation, if he will want all day to-morrow? — the Reader replied in the thinnest and meekest of frightened voices, "If quite convenient, sir!" It brought into full view instantaneously, and for the first time, the little Clerk whom one followed in imagination with interest a minute afterwards on his "going down a slide at the end of a lane of boys twenty times in honour of Christmas, and then, with the long ends of his white comforter dangling below his waist (for he boasted no greatcoat) running home as hard as he could pelt to play at blind man's buff." Instantly, upon the heels of this, we find noted on the margin, p. 18, "Tone to mystery." The spectral illusion of the knocker on Scrooge's house-door, looking for all the world not like a knocker, but like Marley's face, "with a dismal light about it like a bad lobster in a dark cellar," prepared the way marvellously for what followed. Numberless little tid-bits of description that anybody else would have struck out with reluctance, as, for instance, that of Scrooge looking cautiously behind the street door when he entered, "as if he half expected to be terrified with the sight of Marley's pigtail sticking out into the hall," were unhesitatingly erased by the Reader, as, from his point of view, not necessarily to the purpose. Then, after the goblin incident of the disused bell slowly oscillating until it and all the other bells in the house rang loudly for a while — afterwards becoming in turn just as suddenly hushed — we got to the clanking approach, from the sub-basement of the old building, of the noise that at length came on through the heavy door of Scrooge's apartment! "And" — as the Reader said with startling effect, while his voice rose to a hurried outcry as he uttered the closing exclamation — "upon its coming in, the dying flame leaped up, as though it cried, 'I know him! Marley's Ghost!'" The apparition, although the description of it was nearly stenographically abbreviated in the Reading, appeared to be, in a very few words, no less startlingly realised. "Same face, usual waistcoat, tights, boots," even to the spectral illusion being so transparent that Scrooge (his own marrow, then, we may presume, becoming sensitized) looking through his waistcoat “could see the two back buttons on the coat behind” — with the incorrigible old joker’s cynical reflection to himself that “he had often heard Marley spoken of as having no bowels, but had never believed it until then.” The grotesque humour of his interview with the spectre seemed scarcely to have been realised, in fact, until their colloquy was actually listened to in the Reading.

Scrooge’s entreaty addressed to the Ghost, when the latter demanded a hearing, “Don’t be flowery, Jacob, pray!” was only less laughable, for example, than the expression of the old dreamer’s visage when Marley informed him that he had often sat beside him invisibly! Promised a chance and hope in the fixture — a chance and hope of his dead partner’s procuring — Scrooge’s “Thank ‘ee!” — full of doubt — was a fitting prelude to his acknowledgment of the favour when explained. “You will be haunted,” quoth the Ghost, “by three Spirits.” The other faltering, “I — I think I’d rather not:” and then quietly hinting afterwards, “Couldn’t I take ‘em all at once, and have it over, Jacob?”

As for the revelations made to Ebenezer Scrooge by those three memorable Spirits of Christmas Past, Present, and Future, who can ever hope to relate them and impersonate them as they were related and impersonated by the Author himself of this peerless ghost-story! Fezziwig, for example, with his calves shining like moons, who, after going through all the intricacies of the country dance, bow, corkscrew, thread-the-needle, and back again to your place, cut — ”cut so deftly that he appeared to wink with his legs, and came upon his feet again without a stagger!” The very Fiddler, who “went up to the lofty desk and made an orchestra of it, and tuned like fifty stomach-aches!” Master Peter Cratchit, again, arrayed in his father’s shirt collars, who, rejoicing to find himself so gallantly attired, at one moment “yearned to show his linen in the fashionable parks,” and at another, hearing his sister Martha talk of some lord who “was much about as tall as Peter, pulled up his collars so high that you couldn’t have seen him if you had been there.” As for the pathetic portions of the narrative, it is especially observable in regard to those, that they were anything rather than made too much of. There, more particularly, the elisions were ruthless. Looking through the marked copy, it really would appear that only a very few indeed of the salient points were left in regard to the life and death of Tiny Tim. Bob’s visit to the death-bed was entirely unmentioned. Even the words “Spirit of Tiny Tim, thy childish essence was from God!” were never uttered. Two utterances there were, however, the one breathing an exquisite tenderness, the other indicative of a long-suppressed but passionate outburst of grief, that thrilled to the hearts of all who heard them, and still, we doubt not, haunt their recollection. The one — where the mother, laying her mourning needlework upon the table, put her hand up to her face. “‘The colour hurts my eyes,’ she said. The colour? Ah! poor Tiny Tim!” The other, where the father, while describing the little creature’s grave, breaks down in a sudden agony of tears. “It would have done you good to see how green a place it is. But you’ll see it often. I promised him that I would walk there on a Sunday — My little, little child! My little child!” It was a touch of nature that made the Reader and his world of hearers, upon the instant, kin. The tearful outcry brimmed to the eyes of those present a thousand visible echoes. “He broke down all at once. He couldn’t help it,” said the Reader, adding in subdued accents the simple words, “If he could have helped it, he and his child would have been further apart perhaps than they were.” With that ended all reference to the home-grief at Bob Cratchit’s. Everything else in relation to the loss of Tiny Tim was foregone unhesitatingly.

The descriptive passages were cut out by wholesale. While the Christmas dinner at Scrooge’s Clerk’s, and the Christmas party at Scrooge’s Nephew’s, were left in almost in their entirety, the street-scenes and shop-window displays were obliterated altogether. Nothing at all was said about the “great round, pot-bellied baskets of chestnuts, shaped like the waistcoats of jolly old gentlemen lolling at the doors and tumbling into the streets in their apoplectic opulence.” Nothing about the ruddy, brown-faced, broad-girthed Spanish onions, shining in the fatness of their growth like Spanish friars, and “winking from their shelves in wanton slyness at the girls as they went by, and glanced demurely at the hung-up mistletoe.” Nothing about the canisters of tea and coffee “rattled up and down like juggling tricks,” or about the candied fruits, “so caked and spotted with molten sugar as to make the coldest lookers-on feel faint, and subsequently bilious.”

Nay, we were denied even a momentary glimpse, on the snow-crueted pavement at nightfall, of that group of handsome girls, all hooded and fur-booted, and all chattering at once, tripping lightly off to some near neighbour’s house, “where, woe upon the single man who saw them enter — artful witches, well they knew it — in a glow!” Topper was there, however, and the plump sister in the lace tucker, and the game of Yes-and-

No, the solution to which was, “It’s your uncle Scro-o-o-o-oge!” Happiest of all these non-omissions, as one may call them, there was that charming picture of Scrooge’s niece by marriage, which — as brightly, exquisitely articulated by the lips of her imaginer — was like the loveliest girl-portrait ever painted by Greuze. “She was very pretty, exceedingly pretty. With a dimpled, surprised-looking, capital face; a ripe little mouth, that seemed made to be kissed — as no doubt it was; all kinds of good little dots about her chin, that melted into one another when she laughed; and the sunniest pair of eyes you ever saw in any little creature’s head. Altogether she was what you would have called provoking, you know; but satisfactory, too. Oh, perfectly satisfactory.” The grave face and twinkling eyes with which this cordial acquiescence in the conclusion arrived at was expressed were irresistibly exhilarating. Just in the same way there was a sort of parenthetical smack of the lips in the self-communing of Scrooge when, at the very close of the story, after hesitating awhile at his Nephew’s door as to whether he should knock, he made a dash and did it. “Is your master at home, my dear?” said Scrooge. “Nice girl! very.” Then, as to the cordiality of his reception by his Nephew, what could by possibility have expressed it better than the look, voice, manner of the Reader. “‘Will you let me in, Fred?’ Let him in! It is a mercy he didn’t shake his arm off.” The turkey that “never could have stood upon its legs, that bird,” but must have “snapped ‘em short off in a minute, like sticks of sealing-wax!” — the remarkable boy who was just about its size, and who, when told to go and buy it, cried out “Walk-ER!” — Bob Cratchit’s trying to overtake nine o’clock with his pen on his arriving nearly twenty minutes afterwards; his trembling and getting a little nearer the ruler when regenerated Scrooge talks about raising his salary, prior to calling him Bob, and, with a clap on the back, wishing him a merry Christmas! — brought, hilariously, the whole radiant Reading of this wonderful story to its conclusion. It was a feast of humour and a flow of fun, better than all the yule-tide fare that ever was provided — fuller of good things than any Christmas pudding of plums and candied fruit-peel — more warming to the cockles of one’s heart, whatever those may be, than the mellowest wassail-bowl ever brimmed to over-flowing. No wonder those two friends of Thackeray, who have been already mentioned, and who were both of them women, said of the Author of the “Carol,” by way of criticism, “God bless him!” This being exclaimed by them, as will be remembered, simply after reading it to themselves. If only they had heard him read it!

THE TRIAL FROM PICKWICK.

Reader and audience about equally, one may say, revelled in the “Trial from Pickwick.” Every well-known person in the comic drama was looked for eagerly, and when at last Serjeant Buzfuz, as we were told, “rose with more importance than he had yet exhibited, if that were possible, and said, ‘Call Samuel Weller,’” a round of applause invariably greeted the announcement of perhaps the greatest of all Dickens’s purely humorous characters. The Reading copy of this abbreviated report of the great case of Bardell v. Pickwick has, among the complete set of Readings, one very striking peculiarity. Half-bound in scarlet morocco like all the other thin octavos in the collection, its leaves though yellow and worn with constant turning like the rest, are wholly unlike those of the others in this, that the text is untouched by pen or pencil. Beyond the first condensation of that memorable 34th chapter of Pickwick, there is introduced not one single alteration by way of after-thought. Struck off at a heat, as it was, that first humorous report of the action for breach of promise of marriage brought by Martha Bardell against Samuel Pickwick admitted in truth in no way whatever of improvement. Anything like a textual change would have been resented by the hearers — every one of them Pickwickian, as the case might be, to a man, woman, or child — as in the estimation of the literary court, nothing less than a high crime and misdemeanour. Once epitomised for the Reading, the printed version, at least of the report, was left altogether intact. Nevertheless, strange to say, there was perhaps no Reading out of the whole series of sixteen, in the delivery of which the Author more readily indulged himself with an occasional gag. Every interpolation of this kind, however, was so obviously introduced on the spur of the moment, so refreshingly spontaneous and so ludicrously apropos, that it was always cheered to the very echo, or, to put the fact not conventionally but literally, was received with peals of laughter. Thus it was in one instance, as we very well remember, in regard to Mr. Justice Stareleigh — upon every occasion that we saw him, one of the Reader’s most whimsical impersonations. The little judge — described in the book as “all face and waistcoat” — was presented to view upon the platform as evidently with no neck at all (to speak of), and as blinking with owl-like stolidity whenever he talked, which he always did under his voice, and with apparently a severe cold in the head. On the night more particularly referred to, Sam Weller, being at the moment in the witness-box, had just replied to the counsel's suggestion, that what he (Sam) meant by calling Mr. Pickwick's "a very good service" was "little to do and plenty to get." — "Oh, quite enough to get, sir, as the soldier said ven they ordered him three hundred and fifty lashes." Thereupon — glowering angrily at Sam, and blinking his eyes more than ever — Mr. Justice Stareleigh remarked, with a heavier cold in the head than hitherto, in a severe monotone, and with the greatest deliberation, "You must not tell us what the soldier says unless the soldier is in court, unless that soldier comes here in uniform, and is examined in the usual way — it's not evidence." Another evening, again, we recall quite as clearly to mind, when the Reader was revelling more even than was his wont, in the fun of this representation of the trial-scene, he suddenly seemed to open up the revelation of an entirely new phase in Mr. Winkle's idiosyncrasy. Under the badgering of Mr. Skimpin's irritating examination, as to whether he was or was not a particular friend of Mr. Pickwick the defendant, the usually placable Pickwickian's patience upon this occasion appeared gradually and at last utterly to forsake him. "I have known Mr. Pickwick now, as well as I can recollect at this moment, nearly — —"

"Pray, Mr. Winkle, do not evade the question. Are you or are you not a particular friend of the defendant's?" "I was just about to say — —" "Will you, or will you not, answer my question, sir?" "Why, God bless my soul, I was just about to say that — — —" Whereupon the Court, otherwise Mr. Justice Stareleigh, blinking faster than ever, blurted out severely, "If you don't answer the question you'll be committed to prison, sir!" And then, but not till then, Mr. Winkle was sufficiently restored to equanimity to admit at last, meekly, "Yes, he was!"

In the Reading of the Trial the first droll touch was the well-remembered reference to the gentlemen in wigs, in the barristers' seats, presenting as a body "all that pleasing variety of nose and whisker for which the bar of England is so justly celebrated." Even the allusion to those among their number who carried a brief "scratching their noses with it to impress the fact more strongly on the observation of the spectators," and the other allusion to those who hadn't a brief, carrying instead red-labelled octavos with "that under-done-pie-crust cover, technically known as law calf," was each, in turn, welcomed with a flutter of amusement. Every point, however minute, told, and told effectively. More effectively than if each was heard for the first time, because all were thoroughly known, and, therefore, thoroughly well appreciated. The opening address of Serjeant Buzfuz every one naturally enough regarded as one of the most mirth-moving portions of the whole representation. In the very exordium of it there was something eminently absurd in the Serjeant's extraordinarily precise, almost mincing pronunciation. As where he said, that "never in the whole course of his professional experience — never from the first moment of his applying himself to the study and practice of the law — had he approached a case with such a heavy sense of respon-see-bee-lee-ty imposed upon him — a respon-see-bee-lee-ty he could never have supported were he not," and so forth. Again, a wonderfully ridiculous effect was imparted by the Reader to his mere contrasts of manner when, at one moment, in the bland and melancholy accents of Serjeant Buzfuz, he referred to the late Mr. Bardell as having "glided almost imperceptibly from the world to seek elsewhere for that repose and peace which a custom-house can never afford," adding, the next instant in his own voice, and with the most cruelly matter-of-fact precision, "This was a pathetic description of the decease of Mr. Bardell, who had been knocked on the head with a quart-pot in a public-house cellar." The gravity of the Reader's countenance at these moments, with, now and then, but very rarely, a lurking twinkle in the eye, was of itself irresistibly provocative of laughter. Even upon the Serjeant's mention of the written placard hung up in the parlour window of Goswell Street, bearing this inscription, "Apartments furnished for single gentlemen: inquire within," the sustained seriousness with which he added, that there the forensic orator paused while several gentlemen of the jury "took a note of the document," one of that intelligent body inquiring, "There is no date to that, is there, sir?" made fresh ripples of laughter spread from it as inevitably as the concentric circles on water from the dropping of a pebble. The crowning extravagances of this most Gargantuan of comic orations were always of course the most eagerly welcomed, such, for example, as the learned Serjeant's final allusion to Pickwick's coming before the court that day with "his heartless tomato-sauce and warming-pans," and the sonorous close of the impassioned peroration with the plaintiff's appeal to "an enlightened, a high-minded, a right-feeling, a conscientious, a dispassionate, a sympathising, a contemplative jury of her civilised countrymen." It was after this, however, that the true fun of the Reading began with the examination and cross-examination of the different witnesses. These, as a matter of course, were acted, not described.

Mrs. Cluppins first entered the box, with her feelings, so far as they could be judged from her voice, evidently all but too many for her. Her fluttered reply showed this at the very commencement, in answer to an inquiry as to whether she remembered one particular morning in July last, when Mrs. Bardell was dusting Pickwick's apartment. "Yes, my lord and jury, I do." "Was that sitting-room the first-floor front?" "Yes, it were, sir" — something in the manner of Mrs. Crupp when at her faintest. The suspicious inquiry of the red-faced little Judge, "What were you doing in the back-room, ma'am?" followed — on her replying lackadaisically, "My lord and jury, I will not deceive you" — by his blinking at her more fiercely, "You had better not, ma'am," were only exceeded in comicality by Justice Stareleigh's bewilderment a moment afterwards, upon her saying that she "see Mrs. Bardell's street-door on the jar."

Judge (in immense astonishment). — "On the what?"

Counsel. — "Partly open, my lord."

Judge (with more owl-like stolidity than ever). — "She said on the jar."

Counsel. — "It's all the same, my lord."

Then — blinking more quickly than before, with a furtive glance at witness, and a doubtful look of abstraction into space — the little Judge made a note of it.

As in Mrs. Cluppins' faintness there was a recognizable touch of Mrs. Crupp, when the spasms were engendering in the nankeen bosom of that exemplary female, so also in the maternal confidences volunteered by the same witness, there was an appreciable reminder of another lady who will be remembered as having been introduced at the Coroner's Inquest in Bleak House as "Anastasia Piper, gentlemen." Regarding that as a favourable opportunity for informing the court of her own domestic affairs, through the medium of a brief dissertation, Mrs. Cluppins was interrupted by the irascible Judge at the most interesting point in her revelations, when, having mentioned that she was already the mother of eight children, she added, that "she entertained confident expectations of presenting Mr. Cluppins with a ninth about that day six months" — whereupon the worthy lady was summarily hustled out of the witness-box.

Nathaniel Winkle, however, consoled us immediately. Don't we remember how, even before he could open his lips, he was completely disconcerted? Namely, when, bowing very respectfully to the little Judge, he had that complimentary proceeding acknowledged snappishly with, “Don’t look at me, sir; look at the jury — — ” Mr. Winkle, in obedience to the mandate, meekly looking “at the place where he thought that the jury might be.” Don’t we remember also perfectly well how the worst possible construction was cast by implication beforehand upon his probable reply to the very first question put to him, namely, by the mere manner in which that first question was put? “Now, sir, have the goodness to let his lordship and the jury know what your name is, will you?” Mr. Skimpin, in propounding this inquiry, inclining his head on one side and listening with great sharpness for the answer, “as if to imply that he rather thought Mr. Winkle’s natural taste for perjury would induce him to give some name which did not belong to him.” Giving in, absurdly, his surname only; and being asked immediately afterwards, if possible still more absurdly, by the Judge, “Have you any Christian name, sir?” the witness, in the Reading, more naturally and yet more confusedly even it seemed than in the book, got that eminent functionary into a great bewilderment as to whether he (Mr. Winkle) were called Nathaniel Daniel, or Daniel Nathaniel. Bewildered himself, in his turn, and that too almost hopelessly, came Mr. Winkle’s reply, “No, my lord; only Nathaniel — not Daniel at all.” Irascibly, the Judge’s, “What did you tell me it was Daniel for, then, sir?” Shamefaced and yet irritably, “I didn’t, my lord.” “You did, sir!” — with great indignation, topped by this cogent reasoning, — “How could I have got Daniel on my notes, unless you told me so, sir?” Nothing at all was said about it in the Reading; but, again and again, Mr. Winkle, as there impersonated, while endeavouring to feign an easiness of manner, was made to assume, in his then state of confusion, “rather the air of a disconcerted pickpocket.”

Better almost than Mr. Winkle himself, however, as an impersonation, was, in look, voice, manner, Mr. Skimpin, the junior barrister, under whose cheerful but ruthless interrogations that unfortunate gentleman was stretched upon the rack of examination. His (Mr. Skimpin’s) cheery echoing — upon every occasion when it was at last extorted from his victim — of the latter’s answer (followed instantly by his own taunts and insinuations), remains as vividly as anything at all about this Reading in our recollection. When at length Mr. Winkle, with no reluctance in the world, but only seemingly with reluctance, answers the inquiry as to whether he is a particular friend of Pickwick, “Yes, I am!” — “Yes, you are!” said Mr.

Skimpin (audibly to the court, but as if it were only to himself). “And why couldn’t you say that at once, sir? Perhaps you know the plaintiff, too — eh, Mr. Winkle?” “I don’t know her; I’ve seen her!” “Oh, you don’t know her, but you’ve seen her! Now have the goodness to tell the gentlemen of the jury what you mean by that, Mr. Winkle.” As to how this unfortunate witness, after being driven to the confines of desperation, on being at last released, “rushed with delirious haste” to the hotel, “where he was discovered some hours after by the waiter, groaning in a hollow and dismal manner, with his head buried beneath the sofa cushions” — not a word was said in the Reading.

A flavour of the fun of Mrs. Sanders’s evidence was given, but only a passing flavour of it, in reference to Mr. Sanders having, in the course of their correspondence, often called her duck, but never chops, nor yet tomato-sauce — he being particularly fond of ducks — though possibly, if he had been equally fond of chops and tomato-sauce, he might have called her that instead, as a term of affection.

The evidence of all, however, was that of Sam Weller, no less to the enjoyment of the Author, it was plain to see, than to that of his hearers. After old Weller’s hoarse and guttural cry from the gallery, “Put it down a wee, my lord,” in answer to the inquiry whether the immortal surname was to be spelt with a V. or a W.; Sam’s quiet “I rayther suspect it was my father, my lord,” came with irresistible effect from the Reader, as also did his recollection of something “wery partickler” having happened on the memorable morning, out of which had sprung the whole of this trial of Bardell v. Pickwick, namely, that he himself that day had “a reg’lar new fit out o’ clothes.” Beyond all the other Wellerisms, however, was Sam’s overwhelmingly conclusive answer to counsel’s inquiry in regard to his not having seen what occurred, though he himself, at the time, was in the passage, “Have you a pair of eyes, Mr. Weller?” “Yes, I have a pair of eyes; and that’s just it If they wos a pair o’ patent double-million magnifying gas microscopes of hextra power, p’r’aps I might be able to see through two flights o’ stairs and a deal door; but bein’ only eyes, you see, my wision’s limited.” Better by far, in our estimation, nevertheless, than the smart Cockney facetiousness of the inimitable Sam; better than the old coachman’s closing lamentation, “Vy worn’t there a alleybi?” better than Mr. Winkle, or Mrs. Cluppins, or Serjeant Buzfuz, or than all the rest of those engaged in any capacity in the trial, put together, was the irascible little Judge, with the blinking eyes and the monotonous voice — himself, in his very pose, obviously, “all face and waistcoat.” Than Mr. Justice Stareleigh there was, in the whole of this most humorous of all the Readings, no more highly comic impersonation.

DAVID COPPERFIELD.

The sea-beach at Yarmouth formed both the opening and the closing scene of this Reading, in six chapters, from "David Copperfield." In its varied portraiture of character and in the wonderful descriptive power marking its conclusion, it was one of the most interesting and impressive of the whole series in its delivery. Through it, we renewed our acquaintance more vividly than ever with handsome, curry-headed, reckless, heartless Steerforth! With poor, lone, lorn Mrs. Gummidge, not only when everythink about her went contrary, but when her better nature gushed forth under the great calamity befalling her benefactor. With pretty little Emily, and bewitching little Dora. With Mr. Micawber, his shirt-collar, his eye-glass, the condescending roll in his voice, and his intermittent bursts of confidence. With Mrs. Micawber, who, as the highest praise we can bestow upon her, is quite worthy of her husband, and who is always, it will be remembered, so impassioned in her declaration that, come what may, she never will desert Mr. Micawber! With Traddles, and his irrepressible hair, even a love-lock from which had to be kept down by Sophy's preservation of it in a clasped locket! With Mr. Peggotty, in fine, who, in his tender love for his niece, is, according to his own account, "not to-look at, but to think on," nothing less than a babby in the form of a great sea Porkypine! Remembering the other originals, crowding the pages of the story in its integrity, how one would have liked to have seen even a few more of them impersonated by the protean Novelist! That "most wonderful woman in the world," Aunt Betsey, for example; or that most laconic of carriers, Mr. Barkis; or, to name yet one other, Uriah Heep, that reddest and most writhing of rascally attornies. As it was, however, there were abundant realizations within the narrow compass of this Reading of the principal persons introduced in the autobiography of David Copperfield. The most loveable, by the way, of all the young heroes portrayed in the Dickens' Gallery was there, to begin with, for example — the peculiar loveableness of David being indicated as plainly as by any means through the extraordinary variety of pet names given to him by one or another in the course of the narrative. For, was he not the "Daisy" of Steerforth, the "Doady" of Dora, the "Trotwood" of Aunt Betsy, and the "Mas'r Davy" of the Yarmouth boatmen, just as surely as he was the "Mr.

Copper-full” of Mrs. Crupp, the “Master Copperfield” of Uriah Heep, and the “Dear Copperfield” of Mr. Wilkins Micawber?

That “The Personal History and Experiences of David Copperfield the Younger” was, among all its author’s works, his own particular favourite, he himself, in his very last preface to it, in 1867, formally acknowledged. Several years previously, while sauntering with him to and fro one evening on the grass-plot at Gadshill, we remember receiving from him that same admission. “Which of all your books do you think I regard as incomparably your best?” “Which?” “David Copperfield.” A momentary pause ensuing, he added, readily and without the smallest reservation, “You are quite right.” The acknowledgment then made as to this being in fact his own opinion was thus simply but emphatically expressed. Pen in hand, long afterwards, he made the same admission, only with yet greater emphasis, when the Preface to the new edition of the story in 1867 was thus closed by Charles Dickens — “Of all my books, I like this the best. It will be easily believed that I am a fond parent to every child of my fancy, and that no one can ever love that family as dearly as I love them. But, like many fond parents, I have in my heart of hearts a favourite child. And his name is ‘David Copperfield.’” Having that confession from his own lips and under his own hand, it will be readily understood that the Novelist always took an especial delight when, in the course of his Readings, the turn came for that of “David Copperfield.”

One of the keenest sensations of pleasure he ever experienced as a Reader — as he himself related to us with the liveliest gratification, evidently, even in the mere recollection of the incident — occurred in connection with this very Reading. Strange to say, moreover, it occurred, not in England or in America, in the presence of an English-speaking audience, but in Paris, and face to face with an audience more than half of which was composed of Frenchmen. And the hearer who caused him, there, that artistic sense, one might almost call it thrill of satisfaction — -was a Frenchman! All that was expressed on the part of this appreciative listener, being uttered by him instantaneously in a half-whispered, monosyllabic ejaculation. As we have already explained upon an earlier page, the Readings which took place in Paris, and which were in behalf of the British Charitable Fund in that capital, were given there before a densely crowded but very select audience at the British Embassy, Lord Cowley being then her Majesty’s ambassador. The Reading on the occasion referred to was “David Copperfield,” and the Reader became aware in the midst of the hushed silence, just after he had been saying, in the voice of Steerforth, giving at the same moment a cordial grasp of the hand to the briny fisherman he was addressing: “Mr. Peggotty, you are a thoroughly good fellow, and deserve to be as happy as you are to-night. My hand upon it!” when, turning round, he added, still as Steerforth, but speaking in a very different voice and offering a very different hand-grip, as though already he were thinking to himself what a chuckle-headed fellow the young shipwright was — ”Ham, I give you joy, my boy. My hand upon that too!” The always keenly observant Novelist became aware of a Frenchman, who was eagerly listening in the front row of the stalls, suddenly exclaiming to himself, under his breath, “Ah — h!” — having instantly caught the situation! The sound of that one inarticulate monosyllable, as he observed, when relating the circumstance, gave the Reader, as an artist, a far livelier sense of satisfaction than any that could possibly have been imparted by mere acclamations, no matter how spontaneous or enthusiastic.

As a Reading, it always seemed to us, that “David Copperfield” was cut down rather distressingly. That, nevertheless, was unavoidable. Turning in off Yarmouth sands, we went straight at once through the “delightful door” cut in its side, into the old black barge or boat, high and dry there on the sea-beach, and which was known to us nearly as familiarly as to David himself, as the odd dwelling-house inhabited by Mr. Peggotty. All the still-life of that beautifully clean and tidy interior we had revealed to us again, as of old: lockers, boxes, table, Dutch clock, chest of drawers — even tea-tray, only that we failed to hear anything said about the painting on the tea-tray, representing “a lady with a parasol, taking a walk with a military-looking child, who was trundling a hoop.” The necessities of condensation in the same way restricted the definition of Mr. Peggotty’s occupation in the Reading, to the simple mention of the fact that he dealt in lobsters, crabs, and craw-fish, without any explanation at all as to those creatures being heaped together in a little wooden out-house “in a state of wonderful conglomeration with one another, and never leaving off pinching whatever they laid hold of.” Little Emily appeared as a beautiful young woman, and no longer as the prattling lassie who, years before had confided to her playfellow, David, how, if ever she were a lady, she would give uncle Dan, meaning Mr. Peggotty, “a sky-blue coat, with diamond buttons, nankeen trousers, a red velvet waistcoat, a cocked hat, a large gold watch, a silver pipe, and a box of money.” Mrs. Gummidge, as became a faithful widow, was still fretting after the Old ‘Un. Ham, something of Mr. Peggotty’s own build, as the latter described him, “a good deal o’ the sou-wester in him, wery salt, but on the whole, a honest sort of a chap, too, with his ‘art in the right place,” had just made good his betrothal to the little creature he had seen grow up there before him, “like a flower,” when, at the very opening of the Reading, into the old Yarmouth boat, walked “Mas’r Davy” and his friend Steerforth. Mr. Peggotty’s explanation to his unexpected but heartily welcomed visitors as to how the engagement between Ham and Emily, had but just then been brought about, opened up before the audience in a few words the whole scheme of the tragic little dramatic tale about to be revealed to them through a series of vivid impersonations.

The idiomatic sentences of the bluff fisherman, as in their racy vernacular they were blithely given utterance to by the manly voice of the Reader, seemed to supply a fitting introduction to the drama, as though from the lips of a Yarmouth Chorus. Scarcely had the social carouse there in the old boat, on that memorable evening of Steerforth’s introduction, been recounted, when the whole drift of the story was clearly foreshadowed in the brief talk which immediately took place between him and David as they walked townwards across the sands towards their hotel. “Daisy, — for though that’s not the name your godfathers and godmothers gave you, you’re such a fresh fellow, that it’s the name I best like to call you by — and I wish, I wish, I wish you could give it to me!” That of itself had its-significance. But still more significant was David’s mention of his looking in at Steerforth’s bedroom on the following morning, before himself going away alone, and of his there finding the handsome scapegrace fast asleep, “lying easily, with his head upon his-arm,” as he had often seen him lie in the old school dormitory. “Thus in this silent hour I left him,” with mournful tenderness, exclaimed the Reader, in the words and accents of his young hero. “Never more, O God forgive you, Steerforth! to touch that passive hand in love and friendship. Never, never more!” The revelation of his treachery, towards the pretty little betrothed of the young shipwright, followed immediately afterwards, on the occasion of David’s next visit, some months later, to the old boat on the flats at Yarmouth.

The wonder still is to us, now that we are recalling to mind the salient peculiarities of this Reading, as we do so, turning over leaf by leaf the marked copy of it, from which the Novelist read; the wonder, we repeat, still is to us how, in that exquisite scene, the very words that have always moved us most in the novel were struck out in the delivery, are rigidly scored through here with blue inkmarks in the reading copy, by the hand of the Reader-Novelist. Those words we mean which occur, where Ham, having on his arrival, made a movement as if Em'ly were outside, asked Mas'r Davy to "come out a minute," only for him, on his doing so, to find that Em'ly was not there, and that Ham was deadly pale. "Ham! what's the matter?" was gasped out in the Reading. But — not what follows, immediately on that, in the original narrative: "'Mas'r Davy!' Oh, for his broken heart, how dreadfully he wept!" Nor yet the sympathetic exclamations of David, who, in the novel, describes himself as paralysed by the sight of such grief, not knowing what he thought or what he dreaded; only able to look at him, — yet crying out to him the next moment, "Ham! Poor, good fellow! For heaven's sake tell me what's the matter?" Nothing of this: only — "My love, Mas'r Davy — the pride and hope of my 'art, her that I'd have died for, and would die for now — she's gone!" "Gone?" "Em'ly's run away!" Ham, not then adding in the Reading, "Oh, Mas'r Davy, think how she's run away, when I pray my good and gracious God to kill her (her that is so dear above all things) sooner than let her come to ruin and disgrace!" Yet, for all that, in spite of these omissions — it can hardly by any chance have been actually by reason of them — the delivery of the whole scene was singularly powerful and affecting. Especially in the representation of Mr. Peggotty's profound grief, under what is to him so appalling a calamity. Especially also in the revelation of Mrs. Gummidge's pity for him, her gratitude to him, and her womanly tender-heartedness.

In charming relief to the sequel of this tragic incident of the bereavement of the Peggottys, came David's love passages with Dora, and his social unbendings with Mr. Micawber. Regaling the latter inimitable personage, and his equally inimitable wife, together with David's old schoolfellow, Tradelles, on a banquet of boiled leg of mutton, very red inside and very pale outside, as well as upon a delusive pigeon-pie, the crust of which was like a disappointing phrenological head, "full of lumps and bumps, with nothing particular underneath," David afforded us the opportunity of realising, within a very brief interval, something at least of the abundant humour associated with Mrs. Micawber's worldly wisdom, and Mr. Micawber's ostentatious impecuniosity. A word, that last, it always seems to us — describing poverty, as it does, with such an air of pomp — especially provided beforehand for Mr. Micawber (out of a prophetic anticipation or foreknowledge of him) by the dictionary.

The mere opening of the evening's entertainment at David Copperfield's chambers on this occasion, enabled the Humorist to elicit preliminary roars of laughter from his audience by his very manner of saying, with a deliciously ridiculous prolongation of the liquid consonant forming the initial of the last word — "As to Mrs. Micawber, I don't know whether it was the effect of the cap, or the lavender water, or the phis, or the fire, or the wax-candles, but she came out of my room comparatively speaking l-l-lovely!"

As deliciously ridiculous was the whole scene between Dora and David, where the latter, at length, takes courage to make his proposal — "Jip barking madly all the time " — Dora crying the while and trembling. David's eloquence increasing, the more he raved, the more Jip barked — each, in his own way, getting more mad every moment! Even when they had got married by licence, "the Archbishop of Canterbury invoking a blessing, and doing it as cheap as it could possibly be expected," their domestic experiences were sources of unbounded merriment.

As, for example, in connection with their servant girl's cousin in the Life Guards, "with such long legs that he looked like the afternoon shadow of somebody else." Finally, closing the whole of this ingenious epitome of the original narrative, came that grand and wonderfully realistic description of the stupendous storm upon the beach at Yarmouth, upon the extraordinary power of which as a piece of declamation we have already at some length commented. There, in the midst of the dying horrors of that storm — there, on those familiar sands, where Mas'r Davy and Little Em'ly had so often looked for shells when they were children, on the very spot where some lighter fragments of the old boat, blown down the night before, had been scattered by the tempest, David Copperfield was heard describing, in the last mournful sentence of the Reading, how he saw him lying with his curly head upon his arm, as he had often seen him lie when they were at school together.

THE CRICKET ON THE HEARTH.

A Fairy Tale of Home was here related, that in its graceful and fantastic freaks of fancy might have been imagined by the Danish poet, Hans Christian Andersen. In its combination of simple pathos and genial drollery, however, it was a story that no other could by possibility have told than the great English Humorist. If there was something really akin to the genius of Andersen, in the notion of the Cricket with its shrill, sharp, piercing voice resounding through the house, and seeming to twinkle in the outer darkness like a star, Dickens, and no other could, by any chance, have conjured up the forms of either Caleb Plummer, or Gruff-and-Tackleton. The cuckoo on the Dutch clock, now like a spectral voice, now hiccouging on the assembled company, as if he had got drunk for joy; the little haymaker over the dial mowing down imaginary grass, jerking right and left with his scythe in front of a Moorish palace; the hideous, hairy, red-eyed jacks-in-boxes; the flies in the Noah's arks, that "an't on that scale neither as compared with elephants;" the giant masks, having a certain furtive leer, "safe to destroy the peace of mind of any young gentlemen between the ages of six and eleven, for the whole Christmas or Midsummer vacation," were all of them like dreams of the Danish poet, coloured into a semblance of life by the grotesque humour of the English Novelist. But dear little Dot, who was rather of the dumpling's shape — "but I don't myself object to that" — and good, lumbering John Peerybingle, her husband, often so near to something or another very clever, according to his own account, and Boxer, the carrier's dog, "with that preposterous nothing of a fag-end of a tail of his, describing circles of barks round the horse, making savage rushes at his mistress, and facetiously bringing himself to sudden stops," — all bear upon them unmistakably the sign-manual of Boz.

As originally recounted in the Christmas story-book, the whole narrative was comprised within a very few pages, portioned out into three little chirps. Yet the letter-press was illustrated profusely by pencils as eminent as those of Daniel Maclise, of Clarkson Stanfield, of Richard Doyle, of John Leech, of Sir Edwin Landseer. The charming little fairy tale, moreover, was inscribed to Lord Jeffrey. It was a favourite of his, as it still is of many another critic north and south of the Tweed, light, nay trivial, though the materials out of which the homely apologue is composed. It can hardly be wondered at, however, remembering how less than four years prior to its first publication, a literary reviewer, no less formidable than Professor Wilson — while abstaining, in his then capacity as chairman of the public banquet given to Charles Dickens at Edinburgh, from attempting, as he said, anything like “a critical delineation of our illustrious guest” — nevertheless, added emphatically, “I cannot but express in a few ineffectual words the delight which every human bosom feels in the benign spirit which pervades all his creations.” Christopher North thus further expressed his admiration then of the young English Novelist — “How kind and good a man he is,” the great Critic exclaimed, laying aside for a while the crutch with which he had so often, in the Ambrosian Nights, brained many an arrant pretender to the title of genius or of philanthropist, and turning his lion-like eyes, at the moment beaming only with cordiality, on the then youthful face of Dickens, — “How kind and good a man he is I need not say, nor what strength of genius he has acquired by that profound sympathy with his fellow-creatures, whether in prosperity and happiness, or overwhelmed with unfortunate circumstances.” Purely and simply, in his capacity as an imaginative writer, the Novelist had already (then in the June of 1841) impressed thus powerfully the heart and judgment of John Wilson, of Christopher North, of the inexorable Rhadamanthus of Blackwood and the “Noctes.” Afterwards, but a very little more than two years afterwards, came the “Carol.” The following winter rang out the “Chimes.” The Christmas after that was heard the chirping of the “Cricket.”

Four years previously Professor Wilson, on the occasion referred to, had remarked of him most truly, — “He has not been deterred by the aspect of vice and wickedness, and misery and guilt, from seeking a spirit of good in things evil, but has endeavoured by the might of genius to transmute what was base into what is precious as the beaten gold;” observing, indeed, yet further — “He has mingled in the common walks of life; he has made himself familiar with the lower orders of society.” As if in supplementary and conclusive justification of those words, Dickens, within less than five years afterwards, had woven his graceful and pathetic fancies about the homely joys and sorrows of Bob Cratchit, of Toby Veck, and of Caleb Plummer, of a little Clerk, a little Ticket-porter, and a little Toy-maker. His pen at these times was like the wand of Cinderella’s fairy godmother, changing the cucumber into a gilded chariot, and the lizards into glittering retainers.

At the commencement of this Reading but very little indeed was said about the Cricket, hardly anything at all about the kettle. Yet, as everybody knows, “the kettle began it” in the story-book. The same right of precedence was accorded to the kettle in the author’s delivery of his fairy tale by word of mouth, but otherwise its comfortable purring song was in a manner hushed. One heard nothing about its first appearance on the hearth, when “it would lean forward with a drunken air, and dribble, a very idiot of a kettle,” any more than of its final pæan, when, after its iron body hummed and stirred upon the fire, the lid itself, the recently rebellious lid, performed a sort of jig, and clattered “like a deaf and dumb young cymbal that had never known the use of its twin brother.” Here, again, in fact, as with so many other of these Readings from his own books by our Novelist, the countless good things scattered abundantly up and down the original descriptions — inimitable touches of humour that had each of them, on the appreciative palate, the effect of that verbal bon-bon, the bon-mot — were sacrificed inexorably, apparently without a qualm, and certainly by wholesale. What the Reader looked to throughout, was the human element in his imaginings when they were to be impersonated.

Let but one of these tid-bits be associated directly with the fanciful beings introduced in the gradual unfolding of the incidents, and it might remain there untouched, Thus, for example, when the Carrier’s arrival at his home came to be mentioned, and the Reader related how John Peerybingle, being much taller, as well as much older than his wife, little Dot, “had to stoop a long way down to kiss her” — the words that followed thereupon were happily not omitted: “but she was worth the trouble, — six foot six with the lumbago might have done it.” Several of John’s choicest — all-but jokes were also retained. As, where Dot is objecting to be called by that pet diminutive, ““Why, what else are you?” returned John, looking down upon her with a smile, and giving her waist as light a squeeze as his huge hand and arm could give, ‘A dot and’ — here he glanced at the baby — ‘a dot and carry’ — I won’t say it, for fear I should spoil it; but I was very near a joke. I don’t know as ever I was nearer.” Tilly Slowboy and her charge, the baby, were, upon every mention of them in the Reading, provocative of abundant laughter. The earliest allusion to Miss Slowboy recording these characteristic circumstances in regard to her costume, that it “was remarkable for the partial development, on all possible and impossible occasions, of some flannel vestment of a singular structure, also for affording glimpses in the region of the back of a pair of stays, in colour a dead green." On the introduction of the Mysterious Stranger — apparently all but stone deaf — from the Carrier's cart, where he had been forgotten, the comic influence of the Reading became irresistible.

Stranger (on noticing Dot) interrogatively to John. — "Your Daughter?"

Carrier, with the voice of a boatswain. — "Wife."

Stranger, with his hand to his ear, being not quite certain that he has caught it. — "Niece?"

Carrier, with a roar. — "Wife."

Satisfied at last upon that point, the stranger asks of John, as a new matter of curiosity to him, "Baby, yours?" Whereupon the Reader, as John, "gave a gigantic nod, equivalent to an answer in the affirmative, delivered through a speaking-trumpet."

Stranger, still unsatisfied, inquiring, — "Girl?". — "Bo-o-oy!" was bellowed back by John Peerybingle. It was when Mrs. Peerybingle herself took up the parable, however, that the merriment excited among the audience became fairly irrepressible. Scarcely had the nearly stone-deaf stranger added, in regard to the "Bo-o-oy," — "Also very young, eh?" (a comment previously applied by him to Dot) when the Reader, as Mrs. Peerybingle, instantly struck in, at the highest pitch of his voice, that is, of her voice (the comic effect of this being simply indescribable) — "Two months and three da-ays! Vaccinated six weeks ago-o! Took very fine-ly! Considered, by the doctor, a remarkably beautiful chi-ild! Equal to the general run of children at five months o-old! Takes notice in a way quite won-der-ful! May seem impossible to you, but feels his feet al-ready!" Directly afterwards, Caleb Plummer appeared upon the scene, little imagining that in the Mysterious-Stranger would be discovered, later on, under the disguise of that nearly stone-deaf old gentleman, his (Caleb's) own dear boy, Edward, supposed to have died in the golden South Americas. Little Caleb's inquiry of Mrs. Peerybingle, — "You couldn't have the goodness to let me pinch Boxer's tail, Mum, for half a moment, could you?" was one of the welcome whimsicalities of the Reading. "Why, Caleb! what a question!" naturally enough was Dot's instant exclamation. "Oh, never mind, Mum!" said the little toy-maker, apologetically, "He mightn't like it perhaps" — adding, by way of explanation — "There's a small order just come in, for barking dogs; and I should wish to go as close to Natur' as I could, for sixpence!" Caleb's employer, Tackleton, in his large green cape and bull-headed looking mahogany tops, was then described as entering pretty much in the manner of what one might suppose to be that of an ogreish toy-merchant. His character came out best perhaps — meaning, in another sense, that is, at its worst — when the fairy spirit of John's house, the Cricket, was heard chirping; and Tackleton asked, grumpily, — "Why don't you kill that cricket? I would! I always do! I hate their noise!" John exclaiming, in amazement, — "You kill your crickets, eh?" "Scrunch 'em, sir!" quoth Tackleton. One of the most wistfully curious thoughts uttered in the whole of the Reading was the allusion to the original founder of the toy-shop of Gruff and Tackleton, where it was remarked (such a quaint epitome of human life!) that under that same crazy roof, beneath which Caleb Plummer and Bertha, his blind daughter, found shelter as their humble home, — "the Gruff before last had, in a small way, made toys for a generation of old boys and girls, who had played with them, and found them out, and broken them, and gone to sleep." Another wonderfully comic minor character was introduced later on in the eminently ridiculous person of old Mrs. Fielding — in regard to in-door gloves, a foreshadowing of Mrs. Wilfer — in the matter of her imaginary losses through the indigo trade, a spectral precursor, or dim prototype, as one might say, of Mrs. Pipchin and the Peruvian mines. Throughout the chief part of the dreamy, dramatic little story, the various characters, it will be remembered, are involved in a mazy entanglement of cross purposes. Mystery sometimes, pathos often, terror for one brief interval, rose from the Reading of the "Home Fairy-Tale." There was a subdued tenderness which there was no resisting in the revelation to the blind girl, Bertha, of the illusions in which she had been lapped for years by her sorcerer of a lather, poor little Caleb, the toy-maker. There was at once a tearful and a laughing earnestness that took the Reader's audience captive, not by any means unwillingly, when little Dot was, at the last, represented as "clearing it all up at home" (indirectly, to the great honour of the Cricket's reputation, by the way) to her burly husband — good, stupid, worthy, "clumsy man in general," — John Peerybingle, the Carrier. The one inconsistent person in the whole story, it must be admitted, was Tackleton, who turned out at the very end to be rather a good fellow than otherwise. Fittingly enough, in the Reading as in the book, when the "Fairy Tale of Home" was related to its close, when

Dot and all the rest were spoken of as vanished, a broken child's-toy, we were told, yet lay upon the ground, and still upon the hearth was heard the song of the Cricket.

NICHOLAS NICKLEBY.

A variety of attractive Readings might readily have been culled from Nicholas Nickleby's Life and Adventures. His comical experiences as a strolling-player in the Company of the immortal Crummleses — his desperate encounter with Sir Mulberry Hawk on the footboard of the cabriolet — his exciting rescue of Madeline from an unholy alliance with Gride, the miser, on the very morning fixed for the revolting marriage — his grotesque association for a while with the Kenwigses and their uncle Lilliyick — his cordial relations with the Brothers Cheeryble and old Tim Linkinwater — any one of these incidents in the career of the most high spirited of all the young heroes of our Novelist, would have far more than simply justified its selection as the theme of one of these illustrative entertainments. Instead of choosing any one of those later episodes in the fictitious history of Nicholas Nickleby, however, the author of that enthralling romance of everyday life, picked out, by preference, the earliest of all his young hero's experiences — those in which, at nineteen years of age, he was brought into temporary entanglement with the domestic economy of Dotheboys Hall, and at the last into personal conflict with its one-eyed principal, the rascally Yorkshire school-master.

The Gadshill collection of thin octavos, comprising the whole series of Readings, includes within it two copies of "Mrs. Gamp" and two copies of "Nicholas Nickleby." Whereas, on comparing the duplicates of Mrs. Gamp, the two versions appear to be so slightly different that they are all but identical, a marked contrast is observable at a glance between the two Nicklebys. Each Reading is descriptive, it is true, of his sayings and doings at the Yorkshire school. But, even externally, one of the two copies is marked "Short Time," — the love-passages with Miss Squeers being entirely struck out, and no mention whatever being made of John Browdie, the corn-factor. The wretched school, the sordid rascal who keeps it, Mrs. Squeers, poor, forlorn Smike, and a few of his scarecrow companions — these, in the short-time version, and these alone, constitute the young usher's surroundings. In here recalling to recollection the "Nicholas Nickleby" Reading at all, however, we select, as a matter of course, the completer version, the one for which the generality of hearers had an evident preference: the abbreviated version being always regarded as capital, so far as it went; but even at the best, with all the go and dash of its rapid delivery, insufficient.

Everything, even, we should imagine, to one un-acquainted with the novel, was ingeniously explained by the Reader in a sentence or two at starting. Nicholas Nickleby was described as arriving early one November morning, at the Saracen's Head, to join, in his new capacity (stripling though he was) as scholastic assistant, Mr. Squeers, "the cheap — the terribly cheap" Yorkshire schoolmaster. The words just given in inverted commas are those written in blue ink in the Novelist's handwriting on the margin of his longer Reading copy. As also are the following words, epitomising in a breath the position of the young hero when the story commences — "Inexperienced, sanguine, and thrown upon the world with no adviser, and his bread to win," the manuscript interpolation thus intimates: the letterpress then relating in its integrity that Nicholas had engaged himself as tutor at Mr. Wackford Squeers's academy, on the strength of the memorable advertisement in the London newspapers. The advertisement, that is, comprising within it the long series of accomplishments imparted to the students at Dotheboys Hall, including "single-stick" (if required), together with "fortification, and every other branch of classical literature." The Reader laying particular stress, among other items in the announcement, upon "No extras, no vacations, and diet unparalleled;" and upon the finishing touch (having especial reference to the subject in hand), "An able assistant wanted: annual salary, £5! A master of arts would be preferred!" Immediately after this, in the Reading, came the description of Mr. Squeers, several of the particulars in regard to whose villainous appearance always told wonderfully: as, where it was said "he had but one eye, and the popular prejudice runs in favour of two;" or, again, where in reference to his attire — it having been mentioned that his coat-sleeves were a great deal too-long and his trousers a great deal too short — it was added that "he appeared ill at ease in his clothes, and as if he were in a perpetual state of astonishment at finding himself so respectable." Listening to the Reader, we were there, in the coffee-room of the Saracen's Head — the rascal Squeers in the full enjoyment of his repast of hot toast and cold round of beef, the while five little boys sat opposite hungrily and thirstily expectant of their share in a miserable meal of two-penn'orth of milk and thick bread and butter for three. "Just fill that mug up with lukewarm water, William, will you?" "To the wery top, sir? Why the milk will be drowned!" "Serve it right for being so dear!" Squeers adding with a chuckle, as he pounded away at his own coffee and viands, — "Conquer your passions, boys, and don't be eager after wittles." To see the Reader as Squeers, stirring the mug of lukewarm milk and water, and then smacking his lips with an affected relish after tasting a spoonful of it, before reverting to his own fare of buttered toast and beef, was to be there with Nicholas, a spectator on that wintry morning in the Snow Hill Tavern, watching the guttling pedagogue and the five little famished expectants. Only when Squeers, immediately before the signal for the coach starting, wiped his mouth, with a self-satisfied "Thank God for a good breakfast," was the mug rapidly passed from mouth to mouth at once ravenously and tantalizingly. The long and bitter journey on the north road, through the snow, was barely referred to in the Reading; due mention, however, being made, and always tellingly, of Mr. Squeers's habit of getting down at nearly every stage — "to stretch his legs, he said, — and as he always came back with a very red nose, and composed himself to sleep directly, the stretching seemed to answer." Immediately on the wayfarers' arrival at Dotheboys, Mrs. Squeers, arrayed in a dimity night-jacket, herself a head taller than Mr. Squeers, was always introduced with great effect, as seizing her Squeery by the throat and giving him two loud kisses in rapid succession, like a postman's knock. The audience then scarcely had time to laugh over the interchange of questions and answers between the happy couple, as to the condition of the cows and pigs, and, last of all, the boys, ending with Madame's intimation that "young Pitcher's had a fever," followed up by Squeers's characteristic exclamation, "No! damn that chap, he's always at something of that sort" — when there came the first glimpse of poor Smeke, in a skeleton suit, and large boots originally made for tops, too patched and ragged now for a beggar; around his throat "a tattered child's frill only half concealed by a coarse man's neckerchief." Anxiously observing Squeers, as he emptied his overcoat of letters and papers, the boy did this, we were told, with an air so dispirited and hopeless, that Nicholas could hardly bear to watch him. "Have you — did anybody — has nothing been heard — about me?" were then (in the faintest, frightened voice!) the first stammered utterances of the wretched drudge. Bullied into silence by the brutal schoolmaster, Smeke limped away with a vacant smile, when we heard the female scoundrel in the dimity night-jacket saying, — "I'll tell you what, Squeers, I think that young chap's turning silly."

Inducted into the loathsome school-room on the following morning by Squeers himself, Nicholas, first of all, we were informed, witnessed the manner in which that arrant rogue presided over "the first class in English spelling and philosophy," practically illustrating his mode of tuition by setting the scholars to clean the w-i-n win, d-e-r-s ders, winders — to weed the garden — to rub down the horse, or get rubbed down themselves if they didn't do it well. Nicholas assisted in the afternoon, moreover, at the report given by Mr. Squeers on his return homewards after his half-yearly visit to the metropolis. Beginning, though this last-mentioned part of the Reading did, with Squeers's ferocious slash on the desk with his cane, and his announcement, in the midst of a death-like silence —

"Let any boy speak a word without leave, and I'll take the skin off that boy's back!" many of the particulars given immediately afterwards by the Reader were, in spite of the surrounding misery, irresistibly provocative of laughter. Ample justification for this, in truth, is very readily adduceable. Mr. Squeers having, through his one eye, made a mental abstract of Cobbey's letter, for example, Cobbey and the whole school were thus feelingly informed of its contents — "Oh! Cobbey's grandmother is dead, and his uncle John has took to drinking. Which is all the news his sister sends, except eighteen-pence — which will just pay for that broken square of glass! Mrs. Squeers, my dear, will you take the money?" Another while, Graymarsh's maternal aunt, who "thinks Mrs. Squeers must be a angel," and that Mr. Squeers is too good for this world, "would have sent the two pairs of stockings, as desired, but is short of money, so forwards a tract instead," and so on; "Ah-! a delightful letter — very affecting, indeed!" quoth Squeers. "It was affecting in one sense!" observed the Reader; "for Graymarsh's maternal aunt was strongly supposed by her more intimate friends to be his maternal parent!" Perhaps the epistle from Mobbs's mother-in-law was the best of all, however — the old lady who "took to her bed on hearing that he wouldn't eat fat;" and who "wishes to know by an early post where he expects to go to, if he quarrels with his vittles?" adding, "This was told her in the London newspapers — not by Mr. Squeers, for he is too kind and too good to set anybody against anybody!"

As an interlude, overflowing with fun, came Miss Squeers's tea-drinking — the result of her suddenly falling in love with the new usher, and that chiefly by reason of the straightness of his legs, “the general run of legs at Dotheboys Hall being crooked.” How John Browdie (with his hair damp from washing) appeared upon the occasion in a clean shirt — ”whereof the collars might have belonged to some giant ancestor,” — and greeted the assembled company, including his intended, Tilda Price, “with a grin that even the collars could not conceal,” the creator of the worthy Yorkshireman went on to describe, with a gusto akin to the relish with which every utterance of John Browdie’s was caught up by the listeners. Whether he spoke in good humour or in ill humour, the burly cornfactor was equally delightful. One while saying, laughingly, to Nicholas, across the bread-and-butter plate which they had just been emptying between them, “Ye wean’t get bread-and-butther ev’ry neight, I expect, mun. Ecod, they dean’t put too much intif ‘em. Ye’ll be nowt but skeen and boans if you stop here long eneaf. Ho! ho! ho!” — all this to Nicholas’s unspeakable indignation. Or, another while, after chafing in jealousy for a long time over the coquetries going on between Tilda Price and Nicholas — the Yorkshireman flattening his own nose with his clenched fist again and again, “as if to keep his hand in till he had an opportunity of exercising it on the nose of some other gentleman,” — until asked merrily by his betrothed to keep his glum silence no longer, but to say something: “Say summat?” roared John Browdie, with a mighty blow on the table; “Weal, then! what I say ‘s this — Dang my boans and boddy, if I stan’ this ony longer! Do ye gang whoam wi’ me; and do yon loight and toight young whipster look sharp out for a brokken head next time he cums under my hond. Cum whoam, tell’e, cum whoam!” After Smike’s running away, and his being brought back again, had been rapidly recounted, what nearly every individual member of every audience in attendance at this Reading was eagerly on the watch for all along, at last, in the fullness of time, arrived, — the execrable Squeers receiving, instead of administering, a frightful beating, in the presence of the whole school; having carefully provided himself beforehand, as all were rejoiced to remember, with “a fearful instrument of flagellation, strong, supple, wax-ended, and new!”

So real are the characters described by Charles Dickens in his life-like fictions, and so exactly do the incidents he relates as having befallen them resemble actual occurrences, that we recall to recollection at this moment the delight with which the late accomplished Lady Napier once related an exact case in point, appealing, as she did so, to her husband, the author of the “Peninsular War,” to corroborate the-accuracy of her retrospect! Telling how she perfectly well remembered, when the fourth green number of “Nicholas Nickleby” was just out, one of her home group, who had a moment before caught sight of the picture of the flogging in a shop-window, rushed in with the startling announcement — as though he were bringing with him the news of some great victory — ”What do you think? Nicholas has thrashed Squeers!” As the Novelist read this chapter, or rather the condensation of this chapter, it was for all the world like assisting in person at that sacred and refreshing rite!

Yes, every boy was there, and so was every observant listener, in eager and — knowing what was coming — in delighted expectation. As Squeers was represented as “glaring along the lines,” to assure himself that every boy really was there, what time “every eye drooped and every head cowered down,” the Reader, instead of uttering one word of what the ruffianly schoolmaster ought then to have added: “Each boy keep to his place. Nickleby! you go to your desk, sir!” — instead of saying one syllable of this, contented himself with obeying his own manuscript marginal direction, in one word — Pointing! The effect of this simple gesture was startling — particularly when, after the momentary hush with which it was always accompanied, he observed quietly, — ”There was a curious expression in the usher’s face, but he took his seat without opening his lips in reply.” Then, when the schoolmaster had dragged in the wretched Smike by the collar, “or rather by that fragment of his jacket which was nearest the place where his collar ought to have been,” there was a horrible relish in his saying, over his shoulder for a moment, “Stand a little out of the way, Mrs. Squeers, my dear; I’ve hardly got room enough!” The instant one cruel blow had fallen — ”Stop!” was cried in a voice that made the rafters ring — even the lofty rafters of St. James’s Hall.

Squeers, with the glare and snarl of a wild beast. — ”Who cried stop?”

Nicholas. — ”I did! This must not go on!”

Squeers, again, with a frightful look. — ”Must not go on?”

Nicholas. — ”Must not! Shall not! I will prevent it!”

Then came Nicholas Nickleby’s manly denunciation of the scoundrel, interrupted one while for an instant by Squeers screaming out, “Sit down, you — beggar!” and followed at its close by the last and crowning outrage, consequent on a violent outbreak of wrath on the part of Squeers, who spat at him and struck him a blow across the face with his instrument of torture: when Nicholas, springing upon him, wrested the weapon from his hand, and pinning him by the throat — don't we all exult in the remembrance of it? — "beat the ruffian till he roared for mercy."

After that climax has been attained, two other particulars are alone worthy of being recalled to recollection in regard to this Reading. First, the indescribable heartiness of John Browdie's cordial shake-of-the-hand with Nicholas Nickleby on their encountering each other by accident upon the high road. "Shake honds? Ah! that I weel!" coupled with his ecstatic shout (so ecstatic that his horse shyed at it), "Beatten schoolmeasther! Ho! ho! ho! Beatten schoolmeasther! Who ever heard o' the loike o' that, noo? Give us thee hond agean, yoongster! Beatten schoolmeasther! Dang it, I loove thee for 't!" Finally, and as the perfecting touch of tenderness between the two cousins, then unknown to each other as such, in the early morning light at Boroughbridge, we caught a glimpse of Nicholas and Smike passing, hand in hand, out of the old barn together.

MR. BOB SAWYER'S PARTY.

Quite as exhilarating in its way as the all-but dramatised report of the great breach of promise case tried before Mr. Justice Stareleigh, was that other condensation of a chapter from "Pickwick," descriptive of Mr. Bob Sawyer's Party. It was a Reading, in the delivery of which the Reader himself had evidently the keenest sense of enjoyment. As a humorous description, it was effervescent with fun, being written throughout in the happiest, earliest style of the youthful genius of Boz, when the green numbers were first shaking the sides of lettered and unlettered Englishmen alike with Homeric laughter. Besides this, when given by him as a Reading, it comprised within it one of his very drollest impersonations. If only as the means of introducing us to Jack Hopkins, it would have been most acceptable. But, inimitable though Jack was, he was, at the least, thoroughly well companioned.

As a relish of what was coming, there was that preliminary account of the locality in which the festivities were held, to wit, Lant Street, in the borough of Southwark, the prevailing repose of which, we were told, "sheds a gentle melancholy upon the soul" — fully justifying its selection as a haven of rest by any one who wished "to abstract himself from the world, to remove himself from the reach of temptation, to place himself beyond the possibility of any inducement to look out of window!" As specimens of animated nature, familiarly met with in the neighbourhood, "the pot-boy, the muffin youth, and the baked potato man," had about them a perennial freshness. Whenever we were reminded, again, in regard to the principal characteristics of the population that it was migratory, "usually disappearing on the verge of quarter-day, and generally by night," her Majesty's revenues being seldom collected in that happy valley, its rents being pronounced dubious, and its water communication described as "frequently cut off," we found in respect to the whole picture thus lightly-sketched in, that age did not wither nor custom stale its infinite comicality.

It was when the familiar personages of the story were, one after another, introduced upon the scene, however, that the broad Pickwickian humour of it all began in earnest to be realised. After we had listened with chuckling enjoyment to the ludicrously minute account given of the elaborate preparations made for the reception of the visitors, even in the approaches to Mr. Bob Sawyer's apartment, down to the mention of the kitchen candle with a long snuff, that "burnt cheerfully on the ledge of the staircase window," we had graphically rendered the memorable scene between poor, dejected Bob and his little spitfire of a landlady, Mrs. Raddle. So dejected and generally suppressed was Bob in the Reading, however, that we should hardly have recognised that very archetype of the whole genus of rollicking Medical Students, as originally described in the pages of Pickwick, where he is depicted as attired in "a coarse blue coat, which, without being either a great-coat or a surtout, partook of the nature and qualities of both," having about him that sort of slovenly smartness and swaggering gait peculiar to young gentlemen who smoke in the streets by day, and shout and scream in the same by night, calling waiters by their Christian names, and altogether bearing a resemblance upon the whole to something like a dissipated Robinson Crusoe. Habited, Bob still doubtless was, in the plaid trousers and the large, rough coat and double-breasted waistcoat, but as for the "swaggering gait" just mentioned not a vestige of it remained. Nor could that be wondered at, indeed, for an instant, beholding and hearing, as we did, the shrill ferocity with which Mrs. Raddle had it out with him about the rent immediately before the arrival of his guests.

It is one of the distinctive peculiarities of Charles Dickens as a humorous Novelist, that the cream or quintessence of a jest is very often given by him quite casually in a parenthesis. It was equally distinctive of his peculiarities as a Reader, that the especial charm of his drollery was often conveyed by the merest aside. Thus it was with him in reference to Mrs. Raddle's "confounded little bill," when — in between Ben Allen's inquiry, "How long has it been running?" and Bob Sawyer's reply, "Only about a quarter and a month or so" — the Reader parenthetically remarked, with a philosophic air, "A bill, by the way, is the most extraordinary locomotive engine that the genius of man ever produced: it would keep on running during the longest lifetime without ever once stopping of its own accord." Thus also was it, when he added meditatively to Bob's hesitating explanation to Mrs. Raddle, "the fact is that I have been disappointed in the City to-day" — "Extraordinary place that City: astonishing number of men always are getting disappointed there." Hereupon it was that that fiercest of little women, Mrs. Raddle, who had entered "in a tremble with passion and pale with rage," fairly let out at her lodger. Her incidental bout with Mr.

Ben Allen, when he soothingly(!) interpolated, "My good soul," was, in the Reading, in two senses, a memorable diversion. Beginning with a sarcastic quivering in her voice, "I am not aweer, sir, that you have any right to address your conversation to me. I don't think I let these apartments to you, sir — " Mrs. Raddle's anger rose through an indignant crescendo, on Ben Allen's remonstrating, "But you are such an unreasonable woman" — to the sharp and biting interrogation, "I beg your parding, young man, but will you have the goodness to call me that again, sir?"

Ben Allen, meekly and somewhat uneasy on his own account, — "I didn't make use of the word in any invidious sense, ma'am."

Landlady, louder and more imperatively, — "I beg your parding, young man, but who do you call a woman? Did you make that remark to me, sir?"

"Why, bless my heart!"

"Did you apply that name to me, I ask of you, sir?"

On his answering, Well, of course he did! — then, as she retreated towards the open room-door, came the last outburst of her invectives, high-pitched in their voluble utterance, against him, against them both, against everybody, including Mr. Raddle in the kitchen — "a base, faint-hearted, timorous wretch, that's afraid to come upstairs and face the ruffinly creaturs — that's afraid to come — that's afraid!" Ending with her screaming descent of the stairs in the midst of a loud double-knock, upon the arrival just then of the Pickwickians, when, "in an uncontrollable burst of mental agony," Mrs. Raddle threw down all the umbrellas in the passage, disappearing into the back parlour with an awful crash. In answer to the cheerful inquiry from Mr. Pickwick, — "Does Mr. Sawyer live here?" came the lugubrious and monotonously intoned response, all on one note, of the aboriginal young person, the gal Betsey (one of the minor characters in the original chapter, and yet, as already remarked, a superlatively good impersonation in the Reading) — "Yes; first-floor. It's the door straight afore you when you get's to the top of the stairs" — with which the dirty slipshod in black cotton stockings disappeared with the candle down the kitchen stair-case, leaving the unfortunate arrivals to grope their way up as they best could. Welcomed rather dejectedly by Bob on the first-floor landing, where Mr. Pickwick put, not, as in the original work, his hat, but, in the Reading, "his foot" in the tray of glasses, they were very soon followed, one after another, by the remainder of the visitors. Notably by a sentimental young gentleman with a nice sense of honour, and, most notably of all (with a heavy footstep, very welcome indeed whenever heard) by Jack Hopkins. Jack was at once the Hamlet and the Yorick of the whole entertainment — all-essential to it — whose very look (with his chin rather stiff in the stock), whose very words (short, sharp, and decisive) had about them a drily and all-but indescribably humorous effect. As spoken by the Novelist himself, Jack Hopkins's every syllable told to perfection. His opening report immediately on his arrival, of "rather a good accident" just brought into the casualty ward — only, it was true, a man fallen out of a four-pair-of-stairs window; but a very fair case, very fair case indeed! — was of itself a dexterous forefinger between the small ribs to begin with. Would the patient recover? Well, no — with an air of supreme indifference — no, he should rather say he wouldn't. But there must be a splendid operation, though, on the morrow — magnificent sight if Slasher did it! Did he consider Mr. Slasher a good operator? "Best alive: took a boy's leg out of the socket last week — boy ate five apples and a gingerbread cake exactly two minutes after it was all over; — boy said he wouldn't lie there to be made game of; and he'd tell his mother if they didn't begin." To hear Dickens say this in the short, sharp utterances of Jack Hopkins, to see his manner in recounting it, stiff-necked, and with a glance under the drooping eyelids in the direction of Mr. Pickwick's listening face, was only the next best thing to hearing him and seeing him, still in the person of Jack Hopkins, relate the memorable anecdote about the child swallowing the necklace — pronounced in Jack Hopkins's abbreviated articulation of it, neck-luss — a word repeated by him a round dozen times at the least within a few seconds in the reading version of that same anecdote. How characteristically and comically the abbreviations were multiplied for the delivery of it, by the very voice and in the very person, as it were, of Jack Hopkins, who shall say! As, for example — "Sister, industrious girl, seldom treated herself to bit of finery, cried eyes out, at loss of — neck-luss; looked high and low for — neck-luss. Few days afterwards, family at dinner — baked, shoulder of mutton and potatoes, child wasn't hungry, playing about the room, when family suddenly heard devil of a noise like small hail-storm." How abbreviated passages like these look, as compared with the original — could only be rendered comprehensible upon the instant, by giving in this place a facsimile of one of the pages relating to Jack Hopkins's immortal story about the — neck-luss, exactly as it appears in the marked copy of the Reading of "Mr. Bob Sawyer's Party," a page covered all over, as will be observed, with minute touches in the Novelist's own handwriting.

Nothing at all in the later version of this Reading was said about the prim person in cloth boots, who unsuccessfully attempted all through the evening to make a joke. Of him the readers of "Pickwick" will very well remember it to have been related that he commenced a long story about a great public character, whose name he had forgotten, making a particularly happy reply to another illustrious individual whom he had never been able to identify, and, after enlarging with great minuteness upon divers collateral circumstances distantly connected with the anecdote, could not for the life of him recollect at that precise moment what the anecdote was — although he had been in the habit, for the last ten years, of telling the story with great applause! While disposed to regret the omission of this preposterously natural incident from the revised version of the Reading, and especially Bob Sawyer's concluding remark in regard to it, that he should very much like to hear the end of it, for, so far as it went, it was, without exception, the very best story he had ever heard — we were more than compensated by another revisive touch, by which Mr. Hopkins, instead of Mr. Gunter, in the pink shirt, was represented as one of the two interlocutors in the famous quarrel-scene: the other being Mr. Noddy, the scorbutic youth, with the nice sense of honour. Through this modification the ludicrous effect of the squabble was wonderfully enhanced, as where Mr. Noddy, having been threatened with being "pitched out o' window" by Mr. Jack Hopkins, said to the latter, "I should like to see you do it, sir," Jack Hopkins curtly retaliating — "You shall feel me do it, sir, in half a minute." The reconciliation of the two attained its climax of absurdity in the Reading, when Mr. Noddy, having gradually allowed his feelings to overpower him, professed that he had ever entertained a devoted personal attachment to Mr. Hopkins. Consequent upon this, Mr. Hopkins, we were told, replied, that, "on the whole, he rather preferred Mr. Noddy to his own mother" — the word standing, of course, as "brother" in the original. Summing it all up, the Reader would then add, with a rise and fall of the voice at almost every other word in the sentence, the mere sound of which was inexpressibly ludicrous — "Everybody said the whole dispute had been conducted in a manner" (here he would sometimes gag) "that did equal credit to the head and heart of both parties concerned."

Another gag, of which there is no sign in the marked copy, those who attended any later delivery of this Reading will well remember he was fond of introducing. This was immediately after Mrs. Raddle had put an end to the evening's enjoyment in the very middle of Jack Hopkins' song (with a chorus) of "The King, God bless him," carolled forth by Jack to a novel air compounded of the "Bay of Biscay" and "A Frog he would a-wooing go" — when poor, discomfited Bob (after turning pale at the voice of his dreaded landlady, shrilly calling out, "Mr. Saw-yer! Mr. Saw-yer!") turned reproachfully on the over-boisterous Jack Hopkins, with, "I thought you were making too much noise, Jack. You're such a fellow for chorusing! You're always at it. You came into the world chorusing; and I believe you'll go out of it chorusing." Through their appreciation of which — more even than through their remembrance of Mrs. Raddle's withdrawal of her nightcap, with a scream, from over the staircase banisters, on catching sight of Mr. Pickwick, saying, "Get along with you, you old wretch! Old enough to be his grandfather, you willin! You're worse than any of 'em!" — the hearers paid to the Reader of Bob Sawyer's Party their last tribute of laughter.

THE CHIMES.

As poetical in its conception, and also, intermittently, in its treatment, as anything he ever wrote, this Goblin Story of Some Bells that Rang an Old Year Out and a New Year In, was, in those purely goblin, or more intensely imaginative portions of it, one of the most effective of our Author's Readings. Hence its selection by him for his very first Reading on his own account in St. Martin's Hall, Long Acre. Listening, as we did, then and afterwards, to the tale, as it was told by his own sympathetic lips, much of the incongruity, otherwise no doubt apparent in the narrative, seemed at those times to disappear altogether. The incongruity, we mean, observable between the queer little ticket-porter and the elfin phantoms of the belfry; between Trotty Veck, in his "breezy, goose-skinned, blue-nosed, red-eyed, stony-toed, tooth-chattering" stand-point by the old church-door, and the Goblin Sight beheld by him when he had clambered up, up, up among the roof-beams of the great church-tower. As the story was related in its original form, it was rung out befittingly from the Chimes in four quarters. As a Reading it was subdivided simply into three parts.

Nothing whatever was preserved (by an error as it always seemed to us) of the admirable introduction. The story-teller piqued no one into attention by saying — to begin with — "There are not many people who would care to sleep in a church." Adding immediately, with delightful particularity, "I don't mean at sermon time in warm weather (when the thing has actually been done once or twice), but in the night, and alone." Not a word was uttered in the exordium of the Reading about the dismal trick the night-wind has in those ghostly hours of wandering round and round a building of that sort, and moaning as it goes; of its trying with a secret hand the windows and the doors, fumbling for some crevice by which to enter, and, having got in, "as one not finding what it seeks, whatever that may be," of its wailing and howling to issue forth again; of its stalking through the aisles and gliding round and round the pillars, and "tempting the deep organ;" of its soaring up to the roof, and after striving vainly to rend the rafters, flinging itself despairingly upon the stones below, and passing mutteringly into the vaults! Anon, coming up stealthily — the Christmas book goes on to say — "It has a ghostly sound, lingering within the Altar, where it seems to chant in its wild way of Wrong and Murder done, and false Gods worshipped, in defiance of the Tables of the Law, which look so fair and smooth, but are so flawed and broken. Ugh! Heaven preserve us, sitting snugly round the fire! — it has an awful voice that Wind at Midnight, singing in a church!” Of all this and of yet more to the like purpose, not one syllable was there in the Reading, which, on the contrary, began at once point-blank: “High up in the steeple of an old church, far above the town, and far below the clouds, dwelt the ‘Chimes’ I tell of.” Directly after which the Reader, having casually mentioned the circumstance of their just then striking twelve at noon, gave utterance to Trotty Yeck’s ejaculatory reflection: “Dinner-time, eh? Ah! There’s nothing more regular in its coming round than dinner-time, and there’s nothing less regular in its coming round than dinner.” Followed by his innocently complacent exclamation: “I wonder whether it would be worth any gentleman’s while, now, to buy that observation for the Papers, or the Parliament!” The Reader adding upon the instant, with an explanatory aside, that “Trotty was only joking,” striving to console himself doubtless for the exceeding probability there was before him, at the moment, of his going, not for the first time, dinnerless.

In the thick of his meditations Trotty was startled — those who ever attended this Reading will remember how pleasantly — by the unlooked-for appearance of his pretty daughter Meg. “And not alone!” as she told him cheerily. “Why you don’t mean to say,” was the wondering reply of the old ticket-porter, looking curiously the while at a covered basket carried in Margaret’s hand, “that you have brought — — — ”

Hadn’t she! It was burning hot — scalding! He must guess from the steaming flavour what it was! Thereupon came the by-play of the Humorist — after the fashion of Munden, who, according to Charles Lamb, “understood a leg of mutton in its quiddity.” It was thus with the Reader when he syllabled, with watering lips, guess after guess at the half-opened basket. “It ain’t — I suppose it ain’t polonies? [sniffing]. No. It’s — it’s mellowier than polonies. It’s too decided for trotters. Liver? No. There’s a mildness about it that don’t answer to liver. Pettitoes? No. It ain’t faint enough for pettitoes. It wants the stringiness of cock’s heads. And I know it ain’t sausages. I’ll tell you what it is. No, it isn’t, neither. Why, what am I thinking of! I shall forget my own name next. It’s tripe!” Forthwith, to reward him for having thus hit it off at last so cleverly, Meg, as she expressed it, with a flourish, laid the cloth, meaning the pocket-handkerchief in which the basin of tripe had been tied up, and actually offered the sybarite who was going to enjoy the unexpected banquet, a choice of dining-places! "Where will you dine, father? On the post, or on the steps? How grand we are: two places to choose from!" The weather being dry, and the steps therefore chosen, those being rheumatic only in the damp, Trotty Veck was not merely represented by the Reader as feasting upon the tripe, but as listening meanwhile to Meg's account of how it had all been arranged that she and her lover Eichard should, upon the very next day, that is, upon New Year's Day, be married.

In the midst of this agreeable confabulation — Richard himself having in the interim become one of the party — the little old ticket-porter, the pretty daughter, and the sturdy young blacksmith, were suddenly scattered. The Reader went on to relate how this happened, with ludicrous accuracy, upon the abrupt opening of the door, around the steps of which they were gathered — a flunkey nearly putting his foot in the tripe, with this indignant apostrophe, "Out of the vays, here, will you? You must always go and be a settin' on our steps, must you? You can't go and give a turn to none of the neighbours never, can't you?" Adding, even, a moment afterwards, with an aggrieved air of almost affecting expostulation, "You're always a being begged and prayed upon your bended knees, you are, to let our door-steps be? Can't you let 'em be?" Nothing more was seen or heard of that footman, and yet in the utterance of those few words of his the individuality of the man somehow was thoroughly realised. Observing him, listening to him, as he stood there palpably before us, one seemed to understand better than ever Thackeray's declaration in regard to those same menials in plush breeches, that a certain delightful "quivering swagger" of the calves about them, had for him always, as he expressed it, "a frantic fascination!" Immediately afterwards, however, as the Reader turned a new leaf, in place of the momentary apparition of that particular flunkey, three very different persons appeared to step across the threshold on to the platform. Low-spirited, Mr. Filer, with his hands in his trousers-pockets. The red-faced gentleman who was always vaunting, under the title of the "good old times," some undiscoverable past which he perpetually lamented as his deceased Millennium. And finally — as large as life, and as real — Alderman Cute. As in the original Christmas book, so also in the Reading, the one flagrant improbability was the consumption by Alderman Cute of the last lukewarm tid-bit of tripe left by Trotty Veck down at the bottom of the basin — its consumption, indeed, by any alderman, however prying or gluttonous. Barring that, the whole of the first scene of the “Chimes” was alive with reality, and with a curious diversity of human character. In the one that followed, and in which Trotty conveyed a letter to Sir Joseph Rowley, the impersonation of the obese hall-porter, later on identified as Tugby, was in every way far beyond that of the pompous humanitarian member of parliament. A hall-porter this proved to be whose voice, when he had found it — “which it took him some time to do, for it was a long way off, and hidden under a load of meat” — was, in truth, as the Author’s lips expressed it, and as his pen had long before described it in the book, “a fat whisper.” Afterwards when re-introduced, Tugby hardly, as it appeared to us, came up to the original description. When the stout old lady, his supposititious wife, formerly, or rather really, all through, Mrs. Chickenstalker, says, in answer to his inquiries as to the weather, one especially bitter winter’s evening, “Blowing and sleeting hard, and threatening snow. Dark, and very cold” — Tugby’s almost apoplectic reply was delicious, no doubt, in its suffocative delivery. “I’m glad to think we had muffins for tea, my dear. It’s a sort of night that’s meant for muffins. Likewise crumpets; also Sally Lunn’s.” But, for all that, we invariably missed the sequel — which, once missed, could hardly be foregone contentedly. We recalled to mind, for example, such descriptive particulars in the original story as that, in mentioning each successive kind of eatable, Tugby did so “as if he were musingly summing up his good actions,” or that, after this, rubbing his fat legs and jerking them at the knees to get the fire upon the yet unroasted parts, he laughed as if somebody had tickled him! We bore distinctly enough in remembrance, and longed then to have heard from the lips of the Reader — in answer to the dream-wife’s remark, “You’re in spirits, Tugby, my dear!” — Tugby’s fat, gasping response, “No, — No. Not particular. I’m a little elewated. The muffins came so pat!” Though, even if that addition had been vouchsafed, we should still, no doubt, have hungered for the descriptive particulars that followed, relating not only how the former hall-porter chuckled until he was black in the face — having so much ado, in fact, to become any other colour, that his fat legs made the strangest excursions into the air — but that Mrs. Tugby, that is, Chickenstalker, after thumping him violently on the back, and shaking him as if he were a bottle, was constrained to cry out, in great terror, “Good gracious, goodness, lord-a-mercy, bless and save the man! What's he a-doing?" To which all that Mr. Tugby can faintly reply, as he wipes his eyes, is, that he finds himself a little "elewated!"

Another omission in the Reading was, if possible, yet more surprising, namely, the whole of Will Fern's finest speech: an address full of rustic eloquence that one can't help feeling sure would have told wonderfully as Dickens could have delivered it. However, the story, foreshortened though it was, precisely as he related it, was told with a due regard to its artistic completeness. Margaret and Lilian, the old ticket-porter and the young blacksmith, were the principal interlocutors. Like the melodrama of Victorine, it all turned out, of course, to be no more than "the baseless fabric of a vision," the central incidents of the tale, at any rate, being composed of "such stuff as dreams are made of." How it all came to be evolved by the "Chimes" from the slumbering brain of the queer, little old ticket-porter was related more fully and more picturesquely, no doubt, in the printed narrative, but in the Reading, at the least, it was depicted with more dramatic force and passion. The merest glimmering, however, was afforded of the ghostly or elfin spectacle, as seen by the "mind's eye" of the dreamer, and which in the book itself was so important an integral portion of the tale, as there unfolded, constituting, as it did, for that matter, the very soul or spirit of what was meant by "The Chimes."

Speaking of the collective chimes of a great city, Victor Hugo has remarked in his prose masterpiece that, in an ordinary way, the noise issuing from a vast capital is the talking of the city, that at night it is the breathing of the city, but that when the bells are ringing it is the singing of the city. Descanting upon this congenial theme, the poet-novelist observes, in continuation, that while at first the vibrations of each bell rise straight, pure, and in a manner separate from that of the others, swelling by degrees, they blend, melt, and amalgamate in magnificent concert until they become at length one mass of sonorous vibrations, which, issuing incessantly from innumerable steeples, float, undulate, bound, whirl over the city, expanding at last far beyond the horizon the deafening circle of their oscillations. What has been said thus superbly, though it may be somewhat extravagantly, by Hugo, in regard to "that tutti of steeples, that column of sound, that cloud or sea of harmony," as he variously terms it, has been said less extravagantly, but quite as exquisitely, by Charles Dickens, in regard to the chimes of a single belfry. After this New Year's tale of his was first told, there rang out from the opposite shores of the Atlantic, that most wonderful tintinnabulation in all literature, “The Bells” of Edgar Poe — which is, among minor poems, in regard to the belfry, what Southey’s “Lodore” is to the cataract, full, sonorous, and exhaustive. And there it is, in that marvellous little poem of “The Bells,” that the American lyrist, as it has always seemed to us, has caught much of the eltrich force and beauty and poetic significance of “The Chimes” as they were originally rung forth in the prose-poetry of the English novelist: —

- “And the people — ah, the people —
- They that dwell up in the steeple,
- All alone,
- And who tolling, tolling, tolling,
- In that muffled monotone,
- Feel a glory in so rolling
- On [or from] the human heart a stone —
- They are neither man nor woman —
- They are neither brute nor human —
- They are Ghouls:
- And their king it is who tolls;
- And he rolls, rolls, rolls,
- Rolls
- A pæan from the hells.”

Charles Dickens, in his beautiful imaginings in regard to the Spirits of the Bells — something of the grace and goblinry of which, Maclise’s pencil shadowed forth in the lovely frontispiece to the little volume in the form in which it was first of all published — has exhausted the vocabulary of wonder in his elvish delineation of the Goblin Sight beheld in the old church-tower on New Year’s Eve by the awe-stricken ticket-porter.

In the Reading one would naturally have liked to have caught some glimpse at least of the swarmmg out to view of the “dwarf-phantoms, spirits, elfin creatures of the Bells;” to have seen them “leaping, flying, dropping, pouring from the Bells,” unceasingly; to have realised them anew as a listener, just as the imaginary dreamer beheld them all about him in his vision — ”round him on the ground, above him in the air, clambering from him by the ropes below, looking down upon him from the massive iron-girded beams, peeping in upon him through the chinks and loopholes in the walls, spreading away and away from him in enlarging circles, as the water-ripples give place to a huge stone that suddenly comes plashing in among them.” In their coming and in their going, the sight, it will be remembered, was equally marvellous. Whether — as the Chimes rang out — we read of the dream-haunted, “He saw them [these swarming goblins] ugly, handsome, crippled, exquisitely formed. He saw them young, he saw them old, he saw them kind, he saw them cruel, he saw them merry, he saw them grim, he saw them dance, he heard them sing, he saw them tear their hair, and heard them howl” — diving, soaring, sailing, perching, violently active in their restlessness — stone, brick, slate, tile, transparent to the dreamer’s gaze, and pervious to their movements — the bells all the while in an uproar, the great church tower vibrating from parapet to basement! Or, whether — when the Chimes ceased — there came that instantaneous transformation! “The whole swarm fainted; their forms collapsed, their speed deserted them; they sought to fly, but in the act of falling died and melted into air. One straggler,” says the book, “leaped down pretty briskly from the surface of the Great Bell, and alighted on his feet, but he was dead and gone before he could turn round.” After it has been added that some thus gambolling in the tower “remained there, spinning over and over a little longer,” becoming fainter, fewer, feebler, and so vanishing — we read, “The last of all was one small hunchback, who had got into an echoing corner, where he twirled and twirled, and floated by himself a long time; showing such perseverance, that at last he dwindled to a leg, and even to a foot, before he finally retired; but he vanished in the end, and then the tower was silent.” Nothing of this, however, was given in the Reading, the interest of which was almost entirely restricted to the fancied fluctuation of fortunes among the human characters. All of the pathetic and most of the comic portions of the tale were happily preserved. When, in the persons of the Tugbys, “fat company, rosy-cheeked company, comfortable company,” came to be introduced, there was an instant sense of exhilaration among the audience.

A roar invariably greeted the remark, “They were but two, but they were red enough for ten.” Similarly pronounced was the reception of the casual announcement of the “stone pitcher of terrific size,” in which the good wife brought her contribution of “a little flip” to the final merry-making. “Mrs. Chicken-stalker’s notion of a little flip did honour to her character,” elicited a burst of laughter that was instantly renewed when the Reader added, that “the pitcher reeked like a volcano,” and that “the man who carried it was faint.” The Drum, by the way — braced tight enough, as any one might admit in the original narrative — seemed rather slackened, and was certainly less effective, in the Reading. One listened in vain for the well-remembered parenthesis indicative of its being the man himself, and not the instrument. “The Drum (who was a private friend of Trotty’s) then stepped forward, and” offered — evidently with a hiccough or two — his greeting of good fellowship, “which,” as we learn from the book, “was received with a general shout.” The Humorist added thereupon, in his character as Storyteller, not in his capacity as Reader, “The Drum was rather drunk, by-the-bye; but never mind.” A band of music, with marrow-bones and cleavers and a set of hand-bells — clearly all of them under the direction of the Drum — then struck up the dance at Meg’s wedding. But, after due mention had been made of how Trotty danced with Mrs. Chickenstalker “in a step unknown before or since, founded on his own peculiar trot,” the story closed in the book, and closed also in the Reading, with words that, in their gentle and harmonious flow, seemed to come from the neighbouring church-tower as final echoes from “The Chimes” themselves.

THE STORY OF LITTLE DOMBEY.

The hushed silence with which the concluding passages of this Reading were always listened to, spoke more eloquently than any applause could possibly have done, of the sincerity of the emotions it awakened. A cursory glance at the audience confirmed the impression produced by that earlier evidence of their rapt and breathless attention. It is the simplest truth to say that at those times many a face illustrated involuntarily the loveliest line in the noblest ode in the language, where Dryden has sung even of a warrior —

- “And now and then a sigh he heaved,
- And tears began to flow.”

The subdued voice of the Reader, moreover, accorded tenderly with one's remembrance of his own acknowledgment ten years after his completion of the book from which this story was extracted, that with a heavy heart he had walked the streets of Paris alone during the whole of one winter's night, while he and his little friend parted company for ever! Charles Young's son, the vicar of Ilminster, has, recently, in his own Diary appended to his memoir of his father, the tragedian, related a curious anecdote, illustrative, in a very striking way, of the grief — the profound and overwhelming grief — excited in a mind and heart like those of Lord Jeffrey, by the imaginary death of another of these dream-children of Charles Dickens. The editor of the Edinburgh Review, we there read, was surprised by Mrs. Henry Siddons, seated in his library, with his head on the table, crying. “Delicately retiring,” we are then told, “in the hope that her entrance had been unnoticed,” Mrs. Siddons observed that Jeffrey raised his head and was kindly beckoning her back. The Diary goes on: “Perceiving that his cheek was flushed and his eyes suffused with tears, she apologised for her intrusion, and begged permission to withdraw. When he found that she was seriously intending to leave him, he rose from his chair, took her by both hands, and led her to a seat.” Then came the acknowledgment prefaced by Lord Jeffrey's remark that he was “a great goose to have given way so.” Little Nell was dead! The newly published number of “Master Humphrey's Clock” (No. 44) was lying before him, in which he had just been reading of the general bereavement!

Referring to another of these little creatures’ deaths, that of Tiny Tim, Thackeray wrote in the July number of Fraser, for 1844, that there was one passage regarding it about which a man would hardly venture to speak in print or in public “any more than he would of any other affections of his private heart.”

It has been related, even of the burly demagogue, O’Connell, that on first reading of Nell’s death in the Old Curiosity Shop, he exclaimed — his eyes running over with tears while he flung the leaves indignantly out of the window — ”he should not have killed her — he should not have killed her: she was too good!”

Finally, another Scotch critic and judge, Lord Cockburn, writing to the Novelist on the very morrow of reading the memorable fifth number of “Dombey and Son,” in which the death of Little Paul is so exquisitely depicted — offering his grateful acknowledgments to the Author for the poignant grief he had caused him — added, “I have felt my heart purified by those tears, and blessed and loved you for making me shed them.”

Hardly can it be matter for wonder, therefore, remarking how the printed pages would draw such tokens of sympathy from men like Cockburn, and Jeffrey, and Thackeray, and O’Connell, that a mixed audience showed traces of emotion when the profoundly sympathetic voice of Dickens himself related this story of the Life and Death of Little Dombey. Yet the pathetic beauty of the tale, for all that, was only dimly hinted at throughout, — the real pathos of it, indeed, being only fully indicated almost immediately before its conclusion. Earlier in the Reading, in fact, the drollery of the comic characters introduced — of themselves irresistible — would have been simply paramount, but for the incidental mention of the mother’s death, when clinging to that frail spar within her arms, her little daughter, “she drifted out upon the dark and unknown sea that rolls round all the world.” Paul’s little wistful face looked out every now and then, it is true, from among the fantastic forms and features grouped around him, with a growing sense upon the hearer of what was really meant by the child being so “old-fashioned.” But the ludicrous effect of those surrounding characters was nothing less than all-mastering in its predominance.

There was Mrs. Pipchin, for example, that grim old lady with a mottled face like bad marble, who acquired an immense reputation as a manager of children, by the simple device of giving them everything they didn't like and nothing that they did! Whose constitution required mutton chops hot and hot, and buttered toast in similar relays! And with whom one of Little Dombey's earliest dialogues in the Reading awakened invariably such bursts of hearty laughter! Seated in his tall, spindle-legged arm-chair by the fire, staring steadily at the exemplary Pipchin, Little Paul, we were told, was asked [in the most snappish voice possible], by that austere female, What he was thinking about?

"You," [in the gentlest childlike voice] said Paul, without the least reserve.

"And what are you thinking about me?"

"I'm — thinking — how old — you must be."

"You mustn't say such things as that, young gentleman. That'll never do."

"Why not [slowly and wonderingly]?"

"Never you mind, sir [shorter and sharper than ever]. Remember the story of the little boy that was gored to death by a mad bull for asking questions."

"If the bull [in a high falsetto voice and with greater deliberation than ever] was mad, how did he know that the boy asked questions? Nobody can go and whisper secrets to a mad bull. I don't believe that story."

Little Dombey's fellow-sufferers at Mrs. Pipchin's were hardly less ludicrous in their way than that bitter old victim of the Peruvian mines in her perennial weeds of black bombazeen. Miss Pankey, for instance, the mild little blue-eyed morsel of a child who was instructed by the Ogress that "nobody who sniffed before visitors ever went to heaven!" And her associate in misery, one Master Bitherstone, from India, who objected so much to the Pipchinian system, that before Little Dombey had been in the house five minutes, he privately consulted that gentleman if he could afford him any idea of the way back to Bengal! What the Pipchinian system was precisely, the Reader indicated perhaps the most happily by his way of saying, that instead of its encouraging a child's mind to develop itself, like a flower, it strove to open it by force, like an oyster. Fading slowly away while he is yet under Mrs. Pipchin's management, poor little Paul, as the audience well knew, was removed on to Doctor Blimber's Academy for Young Gentlemen. There the humorous company gathered around Paul immediately increased. But, before his going amongst them, the Reader enabled us more vividly to realise, by an additional touch or two, the significance of the peculiarity of being “old fashioned,” for which the fading child appeared in everybody’s eyes so remarkable.

Wheeled down to the beach in a little invalid-carriage, he would cling fondly to his sister Florence. He would say to any chance child who might come to bear him company [in a soft, drawling, half-querulous voice, and with the gravest look], “Go away, if you please. Thank you, but I don’t want you.” He would wonder to himself and to Floy what the waves were always saying — always saying! At about the middle of the 47th page of the Reading copy of this book about Little Dombey, the copy from which Dickens Read, both in England and America, there is, in his handwriting, the word — “Pause.” It occurs just in between Little Dombey’s confiding to his sister, that if she were in India he should die of being so sorry and so lonely! and the incident of his suddenly waking up at another time from a long sleep in his little carriage on the shingles, to ask her, not only “What the rolling waves are saying so constantly, but What place is over there? — far away! — looking eagerly, as he inquires, towards some invisible region beyond the horizon!” That momentary pause will be very well remembered by everyone who attended this Reading.

One single omission we are still disposed to regret in the putting together of the materials for this particular Reading from the original narrative. In approaching Dr. Blimber’s establishment for the first time, we would gladly have witnessed the sparring-match, as one may say, on the very threshold, between Mrs. Pipchin the Ogress in bombazeen and the weak-eyed young man-servant who opens the door! The latter of whom, having “the first faint streaks or early dawn of a grin on his countenance — (it was mere imbecility)” as the Author himself explains parenthetically — Mrs. Pipchin at once takes it into her head, is inspired by impudence, and snaps at accordingly. Of this we saw nothing, however, in the Reading. We heard nothing of Mrs. Pipchin’s explosive, “How dare you laugh behind the gentleman’s back?” or of the weak-eyed young man’s answering in consternation, “I ain’t a laughing at nobody, ma’am.” Any more than of the Ogress saying a while later, “You’re laughing again, sir!” or of the young man, grievously oppressed, repudiating the charge with, “I ain’t. I never see such a thing as this!” The old lady as she passed on with, “Oh! he was a precious fellow,” leaving him, who was in fact all meekness and incapacity, “affected even to tears by the incident.” If we saw nothing, however, of that retainer of Dr. Blimber, we were introduced to another, meaning the blue-coated, bright-buttoned butler, “who gave quite a winey flavour to the table-beer — he poured it out so superbly!” We had Dr. Blimber himself, besides, with his learned legs, like a clerical pianoforte — a bald head, highly polished, and a chin so double, it was a wonder how he ever managed to shave into the creases. We had Miss Blimber, in spectacles, like a ghoul, “dry and sandy with working in the graves of deceased languages.” We had Mrs. Blimber, not learned herself, but pretending to be so, which did quite as well, languidly exclaiming at evening parties, that if she could have known Cicero, she thought she could have died contented. We had Mr. Feeder, clipped to the stubble, grinding out his classic stops like a barrel-organ of erudition. Above all, we had Toots, the head boy, or rather “the head and shoulder boy,” he was so much taller than the rest! Of whom in that intellectual forcing-house (where he had “gone through” everything so completely, that one day he “suddenly left off blowing, and remained in the establishment a mere stalk”) people had come at last to say, “that the Doctor had rather overdone it with young Toots, and that when he began to have whiskers he left off having brains.” From the moment when Young Toots’s voice was first heard, in tones so deep, and in a manner so sheepish, that “if a lamb had roared it couldn’t have been more surprising,” saying to Little Dombey with startling suddenness, “How are you?” — every time the Reader opened his lips, as speaking in that character, there was a burst of merriment. His boastful account always called forth laughter — that his tailor was Burgess and Co., “fash’nable, but very dear.” As also did his constantly reiterated inquiries of Paul — always as an entirely new idea — “I say — it’s not of the slightest consequence, you know, but I should wish to mention it — how are you, you know?” Hardly less provocative of mirth was Briggs’s confiding one evening to Little Dombey, that his head ached ready to split, and “that he should wish himself dead if it wasn’t for his mother and a blackbird he had at home.”

Wonderful fun used to be made by the Beader of the various incidents at the entertainment given upon the eve of the vacations by Doctor and Mrs. Blimber to the Young Gentlemen and their Friends, when “the hour was half-past seven o’clock, and the object was quadrilles.” The Doctor pacing up and down in the drawing-room, full dressed, before anybody had arrived, “with a dignified and unconcerned demeanour, as if he thought it barely possible that one or two people might drop in by-and-by!” His exclaiming, when Mr. Toots and Mr. Feeder were announced by the butler, and as if he were extremely surprised to see them, “Aye, aye, aye! God bless my soul!” Mr. Toots, one blaze of jewellery and buttons, so undecided, “on a calm revision of all the circumstances,” whether it were better to have his waistcoat fastened or unfastened both at top and bottom, as the arrivals thickened, so influencing him by the force of example, that at the last he was “continually fingering that article of dress as if he were performing on some instrument!” Thoroughly enjoyable though the whole scene was in its throng of ludicrous particulars, it merely led the way up appreciably and none the less tenderly, for all the innocent laughter, to the last and supremely pathetic incidents of the story as related thenceforth (save only for one startling instant) sotto voce, by the Reader.

The exceptional moment here alluded to, when his voice was suddenly raised, to be hushed again the instant afterwards, came at the very opening of the final scene by Little Dombey’s death-bed, where the sunbeams, towards evening, struck through the rustling blinds and quivered on the opposite wall like golden water. Overwhelmed, as little Paul was occasionally, with “his only trouble,” a sense of the swift and rapid river, “he felt forced,” the Reader went on to say, “to try and stop it — to stem it with his childish hands, or choke its way with sand — and when he saw it coming on, resistless, he cried out!” Dropping his voice from that abrupt outcry instantly afterwards, to the gentlest tones, as he added, “But a word from Florence, who was always at his side, restored him to himself” — the Reader continued in those subdued and tender accents to the end.

The child’s pity for his father’s sorrowing, was surpassed only, as all who witnessed this Reading will readily recollect, by the yet more affecting scene with his old nurse. Waking upon a sudden, on the last of the many evenings, when the golden water danced in shining ripples on the wall, waking mind and body, sitting upright in his bed —

“Yes, yes. No other stranger would have shed those tears at sight of him, and called him her dear boy, her pretty boy, her own poor blighted child. No other woman would have stooped down by his bed and taken up his wasted hand and put it to her lips and breast, as one who had some right to fondle it. No other woman would have so forgotten everybody there but him and Floy, and been so full of tenderness and pity.”

The child's words coming then so lovingly: "Floy! this is a kind good face! I am glad to see it again. Don't go away, old nurse! Stay here! Good bye!" prepared one exquisitely for the rest. "Not goodbye?" "Ah, yes! good-bye!"

Then the end! The child having been laid down again with his arms clasped round his sister's neck, telling her that the stream was lulling him to rest, that now the boat was out at sea and that there was shore before him, and — Who stood upon the bank! Putting his hands together "as he had been used to do at his prayers " — not removing his arms to do it, but folding them so behind his sister's neck — "Mamma is like you, Floy!" he cried; "I know her by the face! But tell them that the picture on the stairs at school is not Divine enough. The light about the head is shining on me as I go!"

Then came two noble passages, nobly delivered.

First — when there were no eyes unmoistened among the listeners —

"The golden ripple on the wall came back again, and nothing else stirred in the room. The old, old fashion! The fashion that came in with our first garments, and will last unchanged until our race has run its course, and the wide firmament is rolled up like a scroll. The old, old fashion — Death!"

And lastly — with a tearful voice —

"Oh, thank God, all who see it, for that older fashion yet of Immortality! And look upon us, Angels of young children, with regards not quite estranged, when the swift river bears us to the ocean!"

Remembering which exquisite words as he himself delivered them, having the very tones of his voice still ringing tenderly in our recollection, the truth of that beautiful remark of Dean Stanley's comes back anew as though it were now only for the first time realised, where, in his funeral sermon of the 19th June, 1870, he said that it was the inculcation of the lesson derived from precisely such a scene as this which will always make the grave of Charles Dickens seem "as though it were the very grave of those little innocents whom he created for our companionship, for our instruction, for our delight and solace." The little workhouse-boy, the little orphan girl, the little cripple, who "not only blessed his father's needy home, but softened the rude stranger's hardened conscience," were severally referred to by the preacher when he gave this charming thought its affecting application. But, foremost among these bewitching children of the Novelist's imagination, might surely be placed the child-hero of a story closing hardly so much with his death as with his apotheosis.

MR CHOPS, THE DWARF.

It remains still a matter of surprise how so much was made out of this slight sketch by the simple force of its humorous delivery. "Mr. Chops, the Dwarf," as, indeed, was only befitting, was the smallest of all the Readings. The simple little air that so caught the dreamer's fancy, when played upon the harp by Scrooge's niece by marriage, is described after all, as may be remembered by the readers of the Carol, to to have been intrinsically "a mere nothing; you might learn to whistle it in two minutes." Say that in twenty minutes, or, at the outside, in half-an-hour, any ordinarily glib talker might have rattled through these comic recollections of Mr. Magsman, yet, when rattled through by Dickens, the laughter awakened seems now in the retrospect to have been altogether out of proportion. In itself the subject was anything but attractive, relating, as it did, merely to the escapade of a monstrosity. The surroundings are ignoble, the language is illiterate, the narrative from first to last is characterised by its grotesque extravagance. Yet the whole is presented to view in so utterly ludicrous an aspect, that one needs must laugh just as surely as one listened. Turning over the leaves now, and recalling to mind the hilarity they used to excite even among the least impressionable audience whenever they were fluttered (there are not a dozen of them altogether) on the familiar reading-desk, one marvels over the success of such an exceedingly small oddity as over the remembrance, let us say, of the brilliant performance of a fantasia on the jew's-harp by Rubenstein.

Nevertheless, slight though it is, the limning all through has touches of the most comic suggestiveness. Magsman's account of the show-house during his occupancy is sufficiently absurd to begin with — "the picter of the giant who was himself the heighth of the house," being run up with a line and pulley to a pole on the roof till "his 'ed was coeval with the parapet;" the picter of the child of the British Planter seized by two Boa Constrictors, "not that we never had no child, nor no Constrictors either;" similarly, the picter of the Wild Ass of the Prairies, "not that we never had no wild asses, nor wouldn't have had 'em at a gift." And to crown all, the picter of the Dwarf — who was "a uncommon small man, he really was. Certainly not so small as he was made out to be; but where is your Dwarf as is?" A picture "like him, too considering, with George the Fourth, in such a state of astonishment at him as his Majesty couldn't with his utmost politeness and stoutness express." Wrote up the Dwarf was, we are told by Mr. Magsman, as Major Tpschoffski — "nobody couldn't pronounce the name," he adds, "and it never was intended anybody should." Corrupted into Chopski by the public, he gets called in the line Chops, partly for that reason, "partly because his real name, if he ever had any real name (which was dubious), was Stakes." Wearing a diamond ring "(or quite as good to look at)" on his forefinger, having the run of his teeth, "and he was a Woodpecker to eat — but all dwarfs are," receiving a good salary, and gathering besides as his perquisites the ha'pence collected by him in a Chaney sarser at the end of every entertainment, the Dwarf never has any money somehow. Nevertheless, having what his admiring proprietor considers "a fine mind, a poetic mind," Mr. Chops indulges himself in the pleasing delusion that one of these days he is to Come Into his Property, his ideas respecting which are never realised by him so powerfully as when he sits upon a barrel-organ and has the handle turned! "Arter the wibration has run through him a little time," says Mr. Magsman, "he screeches out, 'Toby, I feel my property a-coming — gr-r-rind away! I feel the Mint a-jingling in me. I'm a-swelling out into the Bank of England!' Such," reflectively observes his proprietor, "is the influence of music on a poetic mind!" Adding, however, immediately afterwards, "Not that he was partial to any other music but a barrel-organ; on the contrary, hated it." Indulging in day-dreams about Coming Into his Property and Going Into Society, for which he feels himself formed, and to aspire towards which is his avowed ambition, the mystery, as to where the Dwarf's salary and ha'pence all go, is one day cleared up by his winning a prize in the Lottery, a half-ticket for the twenty-five thousand pounder.

Mr. Chops Comes Into his Property — twelve thousand odd hundred. Further than that, he Goes Into Society "in a chay and four greys with silk jackets." It was at this turning-point in the career of his large-headed but diminutive hero that the grotesque humour of the Reader would play upon the risible nerves of his hearers, as, according to Mr. Disraeli's phrase, Sir Robert Peel used to play upon the House of Commons, "like an old fiddle." Determined to Go Into Society in style, with his twelve thousand odd hundred, Mr. Chops, we are told, "sent for a young man he knowed, as had a very genteel appearance, and was a Bonnet at a gaming-booth. Most respectable brought up,” adds Mr. Magsman — ”father having been imminent in the livery-stable line, but unfortunate in a commercial crisis through painting a old grey ginger-bay, and sellin’ him with a pedigree.” In intimate companionship with this Bonnet, “who said his name was Normandy, which it warn’t,” Mr. Magsman, on invitation by note a little while afterwards, visits Mr. Chops at his lodgings in Pall Mall, London, where he is found carousing not only with the Bonnet but with a third party, of whom we were then told with unconscionable gravity, “When last met, he had on a white Roman shirt, and a bishop’s mitre covered with leopard-skin, and played the clarionet all wrong in a band at a Wild Beast Show.” How the reverential Magsman, finding the three of them blazing away, blazes away in his turn while remaining in their company, who, that once heard it, has forgotten? “I made the round of the bottles,” he says — evidently proud of his achievement — ”first separate (to say I had done it), and then mixed ‘em altogether (to say I had done it), and then tried two of ‘em as half-and-half, and then t’other two; altogether,” he adds, “passin’ a pleasin’ evenin’ with a tendency to feel muddled.” How all Mr. Chop’s blazing away is to terminate everybody but himself perceives clearly enough from the commencement.

Normandy having bolted with the plate, and “him as formerly wore the bishop’s mitre” with the jewels, the Dwarf gets out of society by being, as he significantly expresses it, “sold out,” and in this plight returns penitently one evening to the show-house of his still-admiring proprietor. Mr. Magsman happens at the moment to be having a dull tête-à-tête with a young man without arms, who gets his living by writing with his toes, “which,” says the low-spirited narrator, “I had taken on for a month — though he never drawed — except on paper.” Hearing a kicking at the street-door, “‘Halloa!’ I says to the young man, ‘what’s up?’ He rubs his eyebrows with his toes, and he says, ‘I can’t imagine, Mr. Magsman’ — which that young man [with an air of disgust] never could imagine nothin’, and was monotonous company.” Mr. Chops — ”I never dropped the ‘Mr.’ with him,” says his again proprietor; “the world might do it, but not me” — eventually dies. Having sat upon the barrel-organ over night, and had the handle turned through all the changes, for the first and only time after his fall, Mr. Chops is found on the following morning, as the disconsolate Magsman expresses it, “gone into much better society than either mine or Pall Mall’s.” Out of such unpromising materials as these could the alembic of a genius all-embracing in its sympathies extract such an abundance of innocent mirth — an illiterate showman talking to us all the while about such people as the Bonnet of a gaming-booth, or a set of monstrosities he himself has, for a few coppers, on exhibition. Yet, as Mr. Magsman himself remarks rather proudly when commenting on his own establishment, “as for respectability, — if threepence ain’t respectable, what is?”

THE POOR TRAVELLER.

Apart altogether from the Readings of Charles Dickens, has the reader of this book any remembrance of the original story of "The Poor Traveller"? If he has, he will recognise upon the instant the truth of the words in which we would here speak of it, as of one of those, it may be, slight but exquisite sketches, which are sometimes, in a happy moment, thrown off by the hand of a great master. Comparatively trivial in itself — carelessly dashed off, apparently hap-hazard — having no pretension about it in the least, it is anything, in short, but a finished masterpiece. Yet, for all that, it is marked, here and there, by touches so felicitous and inimitable in their way, that we hardly find the like in the artist's more highly elaborated and ambitious productions. Not that one would speak of it, however, as of a drawing upon toned paper in neutral tint, or as of a picture pencilled in sepia or with crayons; one would rather liken it to a radiant water-colour, chequered with mingled storm and sunshine, sparkling with lifelike effects, and glowing with brilliancy. And yet the little work is one, when you come to look into it, that is but the product of a seemingly artless abandon, in which without an effort the most charming results have been arrived at, obviously upon the instant, and quite unerringly.

Trudging down to Chatham, footsore and without a farthing in his pocket, it is in this humble guise first of all that he comes before us, this Poor Traveller. Christian name, Eichard, better known as Dick, his own surname dropped upon the road, he assumes that of Doubledick — being thenceforth spoken of all through the tale, even to the very end of it, by his new name, as Eichard Doubledick. A scapegrace, a ne'er-do-well, an incorrigible, hopeless of himself, despaired of by others, he has "gone wrong and run wild." His heart, still in the right place, has been sealed up. "Betrothed to a good and beautiful girl whom he had loved better than she — or perhaps even he — believed," he had given her cause, in an evil hour, to tell him solemnly that she would never marry any other man; that she would live single for his sake, but that her lips, "that Mary Marshall's lips," would never address another word to him on earth, bidding him in the end — Go! and Heaven forgive him! Hence, in point of fact, this journey of his on foot down to Chatham, for the purpose of enlisting, if possible, in a cavalry regiment, his object being to get shot, though he himself thinks in his devil-may-care indifference, that “he might as well ride to death as be at the trouble of walking.” Premising simply that his hero’s age is at this time twenty-two, and his height five foot ten, and that, there being no cavalry at the moment in Chatham, he enlists into a regiment of the line, where he is glad to get drunk and forget all about it, the Author readily made the path clear for the opening up of his narrative.

Whenever Charles Dickens introduced this tale among his Readings, how beautifully he related it! After recounting how Private Doubledick was clearly going to the dogs, associating himself with the dregs of every regiment, seldom being sober and constantly under punishment, until it became plain at last to the whole barracks that very soon indeed he would come to be flogged, when the Reader came at this point to the words — “Now the captain of Doubledick’s company was a young gentleman not above five years his senior, whose eyes had an expression in them which affected Private Doubledick in a very remarkable way” — the effect was singularly striking. Out of the Reader’s own eyes would look the eyes of that Captain, as the Author himself describes them: “They were bright, handsome, dark eyes, what are called laughing eyes generally, and, when serious, rather steady than severe.” But, he immediately went on to say, they were the only eyes then left in his narrowed world that could not be met without a sense of shame by Private Doubledick. Insomuch that if he observed Captain Taunton coming towards him, even when he himself was most callous and unabashed, “he would rather turn back and go any distance out of the way, than encounter those two handsome, dark, bright eyes.” Here it was that came, what many will still vividly remember, as one of the most exquisitely portrayed incidents in the whole of this Reading — the interview between Captain Taunton and Private Doubledick!

The latter, having passed forty-eight hours in the Black Hole, has been just summoned, to his great dismay, to the Captain’s quarters. Having about him all the squalor of his incarceration, he shrinks from making his appearance before one whose silent gaze even was a reproach. However, not being so mad yet as to disobey orders, he goes up to the officers’ quarters immediately upon his release from the Black Hole, twisting and breaking in his hands as he goes along a bit of the straw that had formed its decorative furniture.

““Come in!’

“Private Doubledick pulled off his cap, took a stride forward and stood in the light of the dark bright eyes.”

From that moment until the end of the interview, the two men alternately were standing there distinctly before the audience upon the platform.

“Doubledick! do you know where you are going to?”

“To the devil, sir!”

“Yes, and very fast.”

Thereupon one did not hear the words simply, one saw it done precisely as it is described in the original narrative: “Private Richard Doubledick turned the straw of the Black Hole in his mouth and made a miserable salute of acquiescence.” Captain Taunton then remonstrates with him thus earnestly: “Doubledick, since I entered his Majesty’s service, a boy of seventeen, I have been pained to see many men of promise going that road; but I have never been so pained to see a man determined to make the shameful journey, as I have been, ever since you joined the regiment, to see you.” At this point in the printed story, as it was originally penned, one reads that “Private Richard Doubledick began to find a film stealing over the floor at which he looked; also to find the legs of the Captain’s breakfast-table turning crooked as if he saw them through water.” Although those words are erased in the reading copy, and were not uttered, pretty nearly the effect of them was visible when, after a momentary pause, the disheartened utterance was faltered out —

“I am only a common soldier, sir. It signifies very little what such a poor brute comes to.”

In answer to the next remonstrance from his officer, Doubledick’s words are blurted out yet more despairingly —

“I hope to get shot soon, sir, and then the regiment, and the world together, will be rid of me!”

What are the descriptive words immediately following this in the printed narrative? They also were visibly expressed upon the platform. “Looking up he met the eyes that had so strong an influence over him. He put his hand before his own eyes, and the breast of his disgrace-jacket swelled as if it would fly asunder.” His observant adviser thereupon quietly but very earnestly remarks, that he “would rather see this in him (Doubledick) than he would see five thousand guineas counted out upon the table between them for a gift to his (the Captain’s) good mother,” adding suddenly, “Have you a mother?” Doubledick is thankful to say she is dead. Reminded by the Captain that if his praises were sounded from mouth to mouth through the whole regiment, through the whole army, through the whole country, he would wish she had lived to say with pride and joy, "He is my son!" Doubledick cries out, "Spare me, sir! She would never have heard any good of me. She would never have had any pride or joy in owning herself my mother. Love and compassion she might have had, and would always have had, I know; but not — spare me, sir! I am a broken wretch quite at your mercy." By this time, according to the words of the writing, according only to the eloquent action of the Reading, "He had turned his face to the wall and stretched out his imploring hand." How eloquently that "imploring hand" spoke in the agonised, dumb supplication of its movement, coupled as it was with the shaken frame and the averted countenance, those who witnessed this Reading will readily recall to their recollection. As also the emotion expressed in the next broken utterances exchanged by the interlocutors: —

"My friend — — —"

"God bless you, sir!"

Captain Taunton, interrupted for the moment, adding —

"You are at the crisis of your fate, my friend. Hold your course unchanged a little longer, and you know what must happen, I know better than ever you can imagine, that after that has happened you are a lost man. No man who could shed such tears could bear such marks."

Doubledick, replying in a low shivering voice, "I fully believe it, sir," the young Captain adds —

"But a man in any station can do his duty, and in doing it can earn his own respect, even if his case should be so very unfortunate and so very rare, that he can earn no other man's. A common soldier, poor brute though you called him just now, has this advantage in the stormy times we live in, that he always does his duty before a host of sympathising witnesses. Do you doubt that he may so do it as to be extolled through a whole regiment, through a whole army, through a whole country? Turn while you may yet retrieve the past and try."

With a nearly bursting heart Richard cries out, "I will! I ask but one witness, sir!" The reply is instant and significant, "I understand you. I will be a watchful and a faithful one." It is a compact between them, a compact sealed and ratified. "I have heard from Private Doubledick's own lips," said the narrator, and in tones how manly and yet how tender in their vibration,

“that he dropped down upon his knee, kissed that officer’s hand, arose, and went out of the light of the dark bright eyes, an altered man.” From the date to them both of this memorable interview he followed the two hither and thither among the battle-fields of the great war between England in coalition with the other nations of Europe and Napoleon.

Wherever Captain Taunton led, there, “close to him, ever at his side, firm as a rock, true as the sun, brave as Mars,” would for certain be found that famous soldier Sergeant Doubledick. As Sergeant-Major the latter is shown, later on, upon one desperate occasion cutting his way single-handed through a mass of men, recovering the colours of his regiment, and rescuing his wounded Captain from the very jaws of death “in a jungle of horses’ hoofs and sabres” — for which deed of gallantry and all but desperation, he is forthwith raised from the ranks, appearing no longer as a non-commissioned officer, but as Ensign Doubledick. At last, one fatal day in the trenches, during the siege of Badajos, Major Taunton and Ensign Doubledick find themselves hurrying forward against a party of French infantry. At this juncture, at the very moment when Doubledick sees the officer at the head of the enemy’s soldiery — “a courageous, handsome, gallant officer of five-and-thirty” — waving his sword, and with an eager and excited cry rallying his men, they fire, and Major Taunton has dropped. The encounter closing within ten minutes afterwards on the arrival of assistance to the two Englishmen, “the best friend man ever had” is laid upon a coat spread out upon the wet clay by the heart-riven subaltern, whom years before his generous counsel had rescued from ignominious destruction. Three little spots of blood are visible on the shirt of Major Taunton as he lies there with the breast of his uniform opened.

“Dear Doubledick, — I am dying.”

To listen to that agonised entreaty as it started from the trembling and one could almost have fancied whitened lips of the Reader, was to be with him there upon the instant on the far-off battle-field. Taunton dies “with his hand upon the breast in which he had revived a soul.” Doubledick, prostrated and inconsolable in his bereavement, has but two cares seemingly for the rest of his existence — one to preserve a packet of hair to be given to the mother of the friend lost to him; the other, to encounter that French officer who had rallied the men under whose fire that friend had fallen. "A new legend," quoth the narrator, "now began to incubate among our troops; and it was, that when he and the French officer came face to face once more, there would be weeping in France." Failing to meet him, however, through all the closing scenes of the great war, Doubledick, by this time promoted to his lieutenancy, follows the old regimental colours, ragged, scarred, and riddled with shot, through the fierce conflicts of Quatre Bras and Ligny, falling at last desperately wounded — all but dead — upon the field of Waterloo.

How, having been tenderly nursed during the total eclipse of an appallingly lengthened period of unconsciousness, he wakes up at last in Brussels to find that during a little more than momentary and at first an utterly forgotten interval of his stupor, he has been married to the gentle-handed nurse who has been all the while in attendance upon him, and who is no other, of course, than his faithful first love, Mary Marshall! How, returning homewards, an invalided hero, Captain Doubledick becomes, in a manner, soon afterwards, the adopted son of Major Taunton's mother! How the latter, having gone, some time later, on a visit to a French family near Aix, is followed by her other son, her other self, he has almost come to be, "now a hardy, handsome man in the full vigour of life," on his receiving from the head of the house a gracious and courtly invitation for "the honour of the company of cet homme si justement célèbre, Monsieur le Capitaine Richard Double-dick!" These were among the incidents in due sequence immediately afterwards recounted!

Arriving at the old chateau upon a fête-day, when the household are scattered abroad in the gardens and shrubberies at their rejoicings, Captain Double-dick passes through the open porch into the lofty stone hall. There, being a total stranger, he is almost scared by the intrusive clanking of his boots. Suddenly he starts back, feeling his face turn white! For, in the gallery looking down at him, is the French officer whose picture he has carried in his mind so long and so far. The latter, disappearing in another instant for the staircase, enters directly afterwards with a bright sudden look upon his countenance, "Such a look as it had worn in that fatal moment," so well and so terribly remembered! All this was portrayed with startling vividness by the Author of the little sketch in his capacity as the sympathetic realizer of the dreams of his own imagination.

Exquisite was the last glimpse of the delineation, when the Captain — after many internal revulsions of feeling, while he gazes through the window of the bed-chamber allotted to him in the old château, “whence he could see the smiling prospect and the peaceful vineyards “ — thinks musingly to himself, “Spirit of my departed friend, is it through thee these better thoughts are rising in my mind! Is it thou who hast shown me, all the way I have been drawn to meet this man, the blessings of the altered time! Is it thou who hast sent thy stricken mother to me, to stay my angry hand! Is it from thee the whisper comes, that this man only did his duty as thou didst — and as I did through thy guidance, which saved me, here on earth — and that he did no more!” Then it was, we were told, there came to him the second and crowning resolution of his life: “That neither to the French officer, nor to the mother of his departed friend, nor to any soul while either of the two was living, would he breathe what only he knew.” Then it was that the author perfected his Reading by the simple utterance of its closing words — ”And when he touched that French officer’s glass with his own that day at dinner, he secretly forgave him — forgave him in the name of the Divine Forgiver.” With a moral no less noble and affecting, no less grand and elevating than this, the lovely idyll closed. The final glimpse of the scene at the old Aix château was like the view of a sequestered orchard through the ivied porchway of a village church. The concluding words of the prelection were like the sound of the organ voluntary at twilight, when the worshippers are dispersing.

MRS. GAMP.

A whimsical and delightful recollection comes back to the writer of these pages at the moment of inscribing as the title of this Reading the name of the preposterous old lady who is the real heroine of "Martin Chuzzlewit." It is the remembrance of Charles Dickens's hilarious enjoyment of a casual jest thrown out, upon his having incidentally mentioned — as conspicuous among the shortcomings of the first acting version of that story upon the boards of the Lyceum — the certainly surprising fact that Mrs. Gamp's part, as originally set down for Keeley, had not a single "which" in it. "Why, it ought actually to have begun with one!" was the natural exclamation of the person he was addressing, who added instantly, with affected indignation, "Not one? Why, next they'll be playing Macbeth without the Witches!" The joyous laugh with which this ludicrous conceit was greeted by the Humorist, still rings freshly and musically in our remembrance. And the recollection of it is doubtless all the more vivid because of the mirthful retrospect having relation to one of the most recent of Dickens's blithe home dinners in his last town residence immediately before his hurried return to Gad's Hill in the summer of 1870. Although we were happily with him afterwards, immediately before the time came when we could commune with him no more, the occasion referred to is one in which we recall him to mind as he was when we saw him last at his very gayest, radiant with that sense of enjoyment which it was his especial delight to diffuse around him throughout his life so abundantly.

Among all his humorous creations, Mrs. Gamp is perhaps the most intensely original and the most thoroughly individualised. She is not only a creation of character, she is in herself a creator of character. To the Novelist we are indebted for Mrs. Gamp, but to Mrs. Gamp herself we are indebted for Mrs. Harris. That most mythical of all imaginary beings is certainly quite unique; she is strictly, as one may say, sui generis in the whole world of fiction. A figment born from a figment; one fancy evolved from another; the shadow of a shadow. If only in remembrance of that one daring adumbration from Mrs. Gamp's sinner consciousness, that purely supposititious entity "which her name, I'll not deceive you, is Harris," one would say that Mr. Mould, the undertaker, has full reason for exclaiming, in regard to Mrs. Gamp, "I'll tell you what, that's a woman whose intellect is immensely superior to her station in life. That's a woman who observes and reflects in a wonderful manner." Mr. Mould becomes so strongly impressed at last with a sense of her exceptional merits, that in a deliciously ludicrous outburst of professional generosity he caps the climax of his eulogium by observing, "She's the sort of woman, now, that one would almost feel disposed to bury for nothing — and do it neatly, too!" Thoroughly akin, by the way, to which exceedingly questionable expression of goodwill on the part of Mr. Mould, is Mrs. Gamp's equally confiding outburst of philanthropy from her point of view, where she remarks — of course to her familiar, as Socrates when communing with his Daemon — "'Mrs. Harris,' I says to her, 'don't name the charge, for if I could afford to lay my fellow-creeturs out for nothink, I would gladly do it, sich is the love I bears 'em.'"

A benevolent unbosoming, or self-revelation, that last, on the part of Mrs. Gamp, so astoundingly outspoken of its kind, that it forces upon one, in regard to her whole character, the almost inevitable reflection that her grotesque and inexhaustible humour, like Falstaff's irrepressible and exhilarating wit, redeems what would be otherwise in itself utterly irredeemable. For, as commentators have remarked, in regard to Shakspeare's Fat Knight, that Sir John is an unwieldy mass of every conceivable bad quality, being, among other things, a liar, a coward, a drunkard, a braggart, a cheat, and a debauchee, one might bring, if not an equally formidable, certainly an equally lengthened, indictment against the whole character of Mrs. Gamp, justifying the validity of each disreputable charge upon the testimony of her own evidence.

In its way, the impersonation of Mrs. Gamp by her creator was nearly as surprising as his original delineation of her in his capacity as Novelist. Happily, to bring out the finer touches of the humorous in her portraiture, there were repeated asides in the Reading, added to which other contrasting characters were here and there momentarily introduced. Mr. Pecksniff — hardly recognisable, by the way, as Mr. Pecksniff — took part, but a very subordinate part, in the conversation, as did Mr. Mould also, and as, towards the close of it, likewise did Mrs. Prig of Bartlemy's. But, monopolist though Mrs. Gamp showed herself to be in her manner of holding forth, her talk never degenerated into a monologue.

Mr. Pecksniff setting forth in a hackney cabriolet to-arrange, on behalf of Jonas Chuzzlewit, for the funeral of the latter's father, in regard to which he is enjoined to spare no expense, arrives, in due course, in Kings-gate-street, High Holborn, in quest of the female functionary — "a nurse and watcher, and performer of nameless offices about the dead, whom the undertaker had recommended." His destination is reached when he stands face to face with the lady's lodging over the bird-fancier's, "next door but one to the celebrated mutton-pie shop, and directly opposite to the original cats'-meat warehouse." Here Mr. Pecksniff's performance upon the knocker naturally arouses the whole neighbourhood, it, the knocker, being so ingeniously constructed as to wake the street with ease, without making the smallest impression upon the premises to which it was addressed. Everybody is at once under the impression that, as a matter of course, he is "upon an errand touching not the close of life, but the other end" — the married ladies, especially, crying out with uncommon interest, "Knock at the winder, sir, knock at the winder! Lord bless you, don't lose no more time than you can help, — knock at the winder!" Mrs. Gamp herself, when roused, is under the same embarrassing misapprehension. Immediately, however, Mr. Pecksniff has explained the object of his mission, Mrs. Gamp, who has a face for all occasions, thereupon putting on her mourning countenance, the surrounding matrons, while rating her visitor roundly, signify that they would be glad to know what he means by terrifying delicate females with "his corpses!" The unoffending gentleman eventually, after hustling Mrs. Gamp into the cabriolet, drives off "overwhelmed with popular execration."

Here it is that Mrs. Gamp's distinctive characteristics begin to assert themselves conspicuously. Her labouring under the most erroneous impressions as to the conveyance in which she is travelling, evidently confounding it with mail-coaches, insomuch that, in regard to her luggage, she clamours to the driver to "put it in the boot," her absorbing anxiety about the pattens, "with which she plays innumerable games of quoits upon Mr. Pecksniff's legs," her evolutions in that confined space with her most prominently visible chattel, "a species of gig umbrella," prepare the way for her still more characteristic confidences. Then in earnest — she had spoken twice before that from her window over the bird-fancier's — but then in earnest, on their approaching the house of mourning, her voice, in the Reading, became recognisable. A voice snuffy, husky, unctuous, the voice of a fat old woman, one so fat that she is described in the book as having had a difficulty in looking over herself — a voice, as we read elsewhere in the novel, having borne upon the breeze about it a peculiar fragrance, “as if a passing fairy had hiccoughed, and had previously been to a wine-vaults.”

““And so the gentleman’s dead, sir! Ah! the more’s the pity!’ — (She didn’t even know his name.) — ‘But it’s as certain as being born, except that we can’t make our calc’lations as exact. Ah, dear!’“

Simply to hear those words uttered by the Reader — especially the interjected words above italicised — was to have a relish of anticipation at once for all that followed. Mrs. Gamp’s pathetic allusion, immediately afterwards, to her recollection of the time “when Gamp was summonsed to his long home,” and when she “see him a-laying in the hospital with a penny-piece on each eye, and his wooden leg under his left arm,” not only confirmed the delighted impression of the hearers as to their having her there before them in her identity, but was the signal for the roars of laughter that, rising and falling in volume all through the Reading, terminated only some time after its completion.

Immediately after came the first introduction by her of the name of Mrs. Harris. “At this point,” observed the narrator, “she was fain to stop for breath. And,” he went on directly to remark, with a combination of candour and seriousness that were in themselves irresistibly ludicrous, “advantage may be taken of the circumstance to state that a fearful mystery surrounded this lady of the name of Harris, whom no one in the circle of Mrs. Gamp’s acquaintance had ever seen; neither did any human being know her place of residence — the prevalent opinion being that she was a phantom of Mrs. Gamp’s brain, created for the purpose of holding complimentary dialogues with her on all manner of subjects.” Eminently seasonable, as a preliminary flourish in this way, is the tribute paid by her to Mrs. Gamp’s abstemiousness, on the understanding that is, that the latter’s one golden rule of life, is complied with — ”“Leave the bottle on the chimbley-piece, and don’t ast me to take none, but let me put my lips to it when I am so disposed, and then, Mrs. Harris, I says, I will do what I am engaged to, according to the best of my ability.’ ‘Mrs. Gamp’ she says, in answer, ‘if ever there was a sober creetur to be got at eighteen-pence a day for working people, and three-and-six for gentlefolks, — night-watching being a extra charge, — you are that inwallable person. Never did I think, till I know’d you, as any woman could sick-nurse and monthly likeways, on the little that you takes to drink.’ ‘Mrs. Harris, ma’am,’ I says to her, ‘none on us knows what we can do till we tries; and wunst I thought so too. But now,’ I says, ‘my half a pint of porter fully satisfies; perwisin’, Mrs. Harris, that it’s brought reg’lar, and draw’d mild.’“ Not but occasionally even that modest “sip of liquor” she finds so far “settling heavy on the chest” as to necessitate, every now and then, a casual dram by way of extra quencher.

It was so arranged in the Reading that, immediately upon the completion of Mrs. Gamp’s affecting narrative of the confidential opinions of her sobriety entertained by Mrs. Harris, Mr. Mould, the undertaker, opportunely presented to the audience his well-remembered countenance — “a face in which a queer attempt at melancholy was at odds with a smirk of satisfaction.” The impersonation, here, was conveyed in something better than the unsatisfactory hint by which that attempted in regard to Mr. Pecksniff was alone to be expressed. Speaking of Old Chuzzlewit’s funeral, as ordered by his bereaved son, Mr. Jonas, with “no limitation, positively no limitation in point of expense,” the undertaker observes to Mr. Pecksniff, “This is one of the most impressive cases, sir, that I have seen in the whole course of my professional experience. Anything so filial as this — anything so honourable to human nature, anything so expensive, anything so calculated to reconcile all of us to the world we live in — never yet came under my observation. It only proves, sir, what was so forcibly expressed by the lamented poet, — buried at Stratford, — that there is good in everything.” Even the very manner of his departure was delicious: “Mr. Mould was going away with a brisk smile, when he remembered the occasion,” we read in the narrative and saw on the platform. “Quickly becoming depressed again, he sighed; looked into the crown of his hat, as if for comfort; put it on without finding any; and slowly departed.”

The spirit and substance of the whole Reading, however, were, as a matter of course, Mrs. Gamp and her grotesque remembrances, drawn, these latter from the inexhaustible fund of her own personal and mostly domestic experiences. “Although the blessing of a daughter,” she observed, in one of her confiding retrospects, “was deniged me, which, if we had had one, Gamp would certainly have drunk its little shoes right off its feet, as with one precious boy he did, and arterwards sent the child a errand to sell his wooden leg for any liquor it would fetch as matches in the rough; which was truly done beyond his years, for ev’ry individgie penny that child lost at tossing for kidney pies, and come home arterwards quite bold, to break the news, and offering to drown’d himself if such would be a satisfaction to his parents.” At another moment, when descanting upon all her children collectively in one of her faithfully reported addresses to her familiar: “‘My own family,’ I says, ‘has fallen out of three-pair backs, and had damp doorsteps settled on their lungs, and one was turned up smilin’ in a bedstead unbeknown. And as to husbands, there’s a wooden leg gone likeways home to its account, which in its constancy of walking into public-’ouses, and never coming out again till fetched by force, was quite as weak as flesh, if not weaker.’”

Somehow, when those who were assisting at this Reading, as the phrase is, had related to them the manner in which Mrs. Gamp entered on her official duties in the sick chamber, they appeared to be assisting also at her toilette: as, for example, when “she put on a yellow nightcap of prodigious size, in shape resembling a cabbage, having previously divested herself of a row of bald old curls, which could scarcely be called false they were so innocent of anything approaching to deception.” One missed sadly at this point in the later version of this Reading what was included in her first conversation on the doormat as to her requirements for supper enumerated after this fashion, “in tones expressive of faintness,” to the housemaid: “I think, young woman, as I could peck a little bit of pickled salmon, with a little sprig of fennel and a sprinkling o’ white pepper. I takes new bread, my dear, with jest a little pat o’ fredge butter and a mossel o’ cheese. With respect to ale, if they draws the Brighton Tipper at any ‘ouse nigh here, I takes that ale at night, my love; not as I cares for it myself, but on accounts of its being considered wakeful by the doctors; and whatever you do, young woman, don’t bring me more than a shilling’s worth of gin-and-water, warm, when I rings the bell a second time; for that is always my allowance, and I never takes a drop beyond. In case there should be sich a thing as a cucumber in the ‘ouse, I’m rather partial to ‘em, though I am but a poor woman.” Winding all up, — with one of those amazing confusions of a Scriptural recollection which prompts her at another time in the novel to exclaim, in regard to the Ankworks package, “‘I wish it was in Jonadge’s belly, I do,’ appearing to confound the prophet with the whale in that mysterious aspiration,” — by observing at this point, “Rich folks may ride on camels, but it ain’t so easy for ‘em to see out of a needle’s eye. That is my comfort, and I hope I knows it.” One whole chapter of “Martin Chuzzlewit,” with the exception of the merest fragment of it — the chapter pre-eminently in relation to Mrs. Gamp — we always regretted as having been either overlooked or purposely set aside in the compilation both of the earlier and the later version of this Reading, the chapter, that is, in which Mrs. Gamp and Mrs. Prig converse together in the former's sleeping apartment.

The mere description of the interior of that chamber, related by the Author's lips, would have been so irresistibly ridiculous — the tent bedstead ornamented with pippins carved in timber, that tumbled down on the slightest provocation like a wooden shower-bath — the chest of drawers, from which the handles had long been pulled off, so that its contents could only be got at either by tilting the whole structure until all the drawers fell out together, or by opening each of them singly with knives like oysters — the miscellaneous salad bought for twopence by Betsey Prig on condition that the vendor could get it all into her pocket (including among other items a green vegetable of an expansive nature, of such magnificent proportions that before it could be got either in or out it had to be shut up like an umbrella), which was happily accomplished in High Holborn, to the breathless interest of a hackney-coach stand.

One inestimable portion, however, of this memorable occasion of festivity between those frequend pardners, Betsey Prig and Sairey Gamp, was, by a most ingenious dovetailing together of two disjointed parts, incorporated with the adroitly compacted materials of a Reading that was as brief as the laughter provoked by it was boisterous and inextinguishable. As to the manner of the dovetailing, it will be readily recalled to recollection. Immediately upon Mrs. Gamp's awaking at the close of her night watch, we were told that Mrs. Prig relieved punctually, but that she relieved in an ill temper. "The best among us have their failings, and it must be conceded of Mrs. Prig," observed the Reader with a hardly endurable gravity of explanation, "that if there were a blemish in the goodness of her disposition, it was a habit she had of not bestowing all its sharp and acid properties upon her patients (as a thoroughly amiable woman would have done), but of keeping a considerable remainder for the service of her friends." Looking offensively at Mrs. Gamp, and winking her eye, as Mrs. Prig does immediately upon her entrance, it is felt by the former to be necessary that Betsey should at once be made sensible of her exact station in society; wherefore Mrs. Gamp prefaced a remonstrance with —

"Mrs. Harris, Betsey — — —"

"Bother Mrs. Harris!"

Then it was that the Reader added: —

“Mrs. Gamp looked at Betsey with amazement, incredulity, and indignation. Mrs. Prig, winking her eye tighter, folded her arms and uttered these tremendous words: —

““I don’t believe there’s no sich a person!’

“With these expressions, she snapped her fingers, once, twice, thrice, each time nearer to Mrs. Gamp, and then turned away as one who felt that there was now a gulf between them that nothing could ever bridge across.”

The most comic of all the Readings closed thus abruptly with a roar.

BOOTS AT THE HOLLY TREE INN.

Even the immortal Boots at the White Hart, Borough, who was first revealed to us in a coarse striped waistcoat with black calico sleeves and blue glass buttons, drab breeches and gaiters, and who answered to the name of Sam, would not, we are certain, have disdained to have been put in friendly relations with Cobbs, as one in every way worthy of his companionship. The Boots at the Holly Tree Inn, though more lightly sketched, was quite as much of an original creation in his way as that other Christmas friend of ours, the warm-hearted and loquacious Cheap Jack, Doctor Marigold. And each of those worthies, it should be added, had really about him an equal claim to be regarded, as an original creation, as written, or as impersonated by the Author. As a character orally portrayed, Cobbs was fully on a par with Doctor Marigold. Directly the Reader opened his lips, whether as the Boots or as the Cheap Jack, the Novelist seemed to disappear, and there instead, talking glibly to us from first to last just as the case might happen to be, was either the patterer on the cart footboard or honest Cobbs touching his hair with a bootjack. His very first words not only lead up to his confidences, but in the same breath struck the key-note of his character. "Where had he been? Lord, everywhere! What had he been? Bless you, everything a'most. Seen a good deal? Why, of course he had. Would be easier for him to tell what he hadn't seen than what he had. Ah! A deal, it would. What was the curiosest thing he'd seen? Well! He didn't know — couldn't name it momentarily — unless it was a Unicorn, and he see him over at a Fair. But" — and here came the golden retrospect, a fairy tale of love told by a tavern Boots, and told all through, moreover, as none but a Boots could tell it — "Supposing a young gentleman not eight year'old, was to run away with a fine young woman of seven, might I think that a queer start? Certainly! Then, that was a start as he himself had had his blessed eyes on — and he'd cleaned the shoes they run away in — and they was so little he couldn't get his hand into 'em." Whereupon, following up the thread of his discourse, Boots would take his crowd of hearers, quite willingly on their part, into the heart of the charming labyrinth.

The descriptive powers of Cobbs, it will be admitted, were for one thing very remarkable. Master Harry Walmers' father, for instance, he hits off to a nicety in a phrase or two. "He was a gentleman of spirit, and good looking, and held his head up when he walked, and had what you may call Fire about him:" adding, that he wrote poetry, rode, ran, cricketed, danced and acted, and "done it all equally beautiful." Another and a very significant touch, by the way, was imparted to that same portraiture later on, just, in point of fact before the close of Cobbs's reminiscence, and one so lightly given that it was conveyed through a mere passing parenthesis — namely, where the young father was described by Boots as standing beside Master Harry Walmers' bed, in the Holly Tree Inn, looking down at the little sleeping face, "looking wonderfully like it," says Cobbs, who adds, "(they do say as he ran away with Mrs. Walmers)." Although Boots described Master Harry's father from the first as "uncommon proud of him, as his only child, you see," the worthy fellow took especial care at once to add, that "he didn't spoil him neither." Having a will of his own, and a eye of his own, and being one that would be minded, while he never tired of hearing the fine bright boy "sing his songs about Young May Moons is beaming, love, and When he who adores thee has left but the name, and that: still," said Boots, "he kept the command over the child, and the child was a child, and it's very much to be wished more of 'em was." At the particular period referred to in this portion of his narrative, Boots informed us pleasantly, that he came to know all about it by reason of his being in his then capacity as Mr. Walmers' under-gardener, always about in the summer time, near the windows, on the lawn "a-mowing and sweeping, and weeding and pruning, and this and that" — with his eyes and ears open, of course, we may presume, in a manner befitting his intelligence.

Perhaps, there was after all nothing better in the delivery of the whole of this Reading, than the utterance of the two words italicised below in the first dialogue, reported by Boots as having taken place between himself and Master Harry Walmers, junior, when "that mite," as Boots calls him, stops one day, along with the fine young woman of seven already mentioned, where Boots (then under-gardener, remember) was hoeing weeds in the gravel: —

"'Cobbs,' he says, 'I like you.' 'Do you, sir? I'm proud to hear it.' 'Yes, I do, Cobbs. Why do I like you, do you think, Cobbs?' 'Don't know, Master Harry, I'm sure.' 'Because Norah likes you, Cobbs.' 'Indeed, sir? That's very gratifying.' 'Gratifying, Cobbs? It is better than millions of the brightest diamonds, to be liked by Norah?' 'Certainly, sir.'"

Confirmed naturally enough in his good opinion of Cobbs by this thorough community of sentiment, Master Harry, who has been given to understand from the latter that he is going to leave, and, further than that, on inquiring, that he wouldn't object to another situation "if it was a good 'un," observes, while tucking that other mite in her little sky-blue mantle under his arm, "Then, Cobbs, you shall be our head gardener when we are married." Boots, thereupon, in the person of the Reader, went on to describe how "the babies with their long bright curling hair, their sparkling eyes, and their beautiful light tread, rambled about the garden deep in love," sometimes here, sometimes there, always under his own sympathetic and admiring observation, until one day, down by the pond, he heard Master Harry say, "Adorable Norah, kiss me and say you love me to distraction." Altogether Cobbs seemed exactly, and with delicious humour, to define the entire situation when he declared, that "on the whole the contemplation of them two babies had a tendency to make him feel as if he was in love himself — only he didn't know who with!"

The delightful gravity of countenance (with a covert sparkle in the eye where the daintiest indications of fun were given by the Reader) lent a charm of its own to the merest nothing, comparatively, in the whimsical dialogues he was reporting. Master Harry, for example, having confided to Cobbs one evening, when the latter was watering the flowers, that he was going on a visit to his grandmama at York — "'Are you indeed, sir? I hope you'll have a pleasant time. I'm going into Yorkshire myself, when I leave here.' 'Are you going to your grandmama's, Cobbs?' 'No, sir. I haven't got such a thing.' 'Not as a grandmama, Cobbs?' 'No, sir.'" Immediately after which, on the boy observing to his humble confidant, that he shall be so glad to go because "Norah's going," Cobbs, naturally enough, as it seemed, took occasion to remark, "You'll be all right then, sir, with your beautiful sweetheart by your side." Whereupon we realised more clearly than ever the delicate whimsicality of the whole delineation, when we saw, as well as heard, the boy return a-flushing, "Cobbs, I never let anybody joke about that when I can prevent them," Cobbs immediately explaining in all humility, "It wasn't a joke, sir — wasn't so meant." No wonder, Boots had exclaimed previously: "And the courage of that boy! Bless you, he'd have throwed off his little hat and tucked up his little sleeves and gone in at a lion, he would — if they'd happened to meet one, and she [Norah] had been frightened." At the close of Boots's record of this last-quoted conversation with Master Harry, came one of the drollest touches in the Reading — ”“Cobbs,” says that boy, ‘I’ll tell you a secret. At Norah’s house, they have been joking her about me, and [with a wondering look] pretending to laugh at our being engaged! Pretending to make game of it, Cobbs!’ ‘Such, sir,’ I says, ‘is the depravity of human natur.’“ A glance during the utterance of which words, either at the Reader himself or at his audience, was something enjoyable.

Hardly less inspiriting in its way was the incidental mention, directly after this by Cobbs, of the manner in which he gave Mr. Walmers notice, not that he’d anything to complain of — ”“Thanking you, sir, I find myself as well sitiuated here as I could hope to be anywheres. The truth is, sir, that I’m a going to seek my fortun.’ ‘O, indeed, Cobbs?’ he says, ‘I hope you may find it.’“ Boots hereupon giving his audience the assurance, with the characteristic touch of the bootjack to his forehead, that “he hadn’t found it yet!”

Then came the delectable account of the elopement — full, true, and particular — from the veracious lips of Cobbs himself, at that time, and again some years afterwards, when he came to call up his recollections, Boots at the Holly Tree Inn. Passages here and there in his description of the incident were irresistibly laughable. Master Harry’s going down to the old lady’s in York, for example, “which old lady were so wrapt up in that child as she would have give that child the teeth in her head (if she had had any).” The arrival of “them two children,” again at the Holly Tree Inn, he, as bold as brass, tucking her in her little sky-blue mantle under his arm, with the memorable dinner order, “Chops and cherry pudding for two!” Their luggage, even, when gravely enumerated — the lady having “a parasol, a smelling bottle, a round and a half of cold buttered toast, eight peppermint drops, and a doll’s hair-brush;” the gentleman having “about half a dozen yards of string, a knife, three or four sheets of writing paper folded up surprisingly small, a orange, and a chaney mug with his name on it.” Several of the little chance phrases, the merest atoms of exclamation here and there, will still be borne in mind as having had an intense flavour of fun about them, as syllabled in the Reading. Boots’s “Sir, to you,” when his governor, the hotel-keeper, proposes to run over to York to quiet their friends’ minds, while Cobbs keeps his eye upon the innocents! Master Harry’s replying to Boots’ suggestion, that they should wile away the time by a walk down Love-lane — ”“Get out with you, Cobbs!’ — that was that there boy's expression." The glee of the children was prettily told too on their finding "Good Cobbs! Dear Cobbs!" among the strangers around them at their temporary halting-place. They themselves appearing smaller than ever in his eyes, by reason of his finding them "with their little legs entirely off the ground, of course — and it really is not possible to express how small them children looked! — on a e-normous sofa;" immense at any time, but looking like a Great Bed of Ware then by comparison.

How, during the governor's absence in search of their friends, Cobbs, feeling himself all the while to be "the meanest rascal for deceiving 'em, that ever was born," gets up a cock and a bull story about a pony he's acquainted with, who'll take them on nicely to Gretna Green — but who was not at liberty the first day, and the next was only "half clipped, you see, and couldn't be took out in that state for fear it should strike to his inside" — was related with the zest of one who had naturally the keenest relish possible for every humorous particular. Finding the lady in tears one time when Boots goes to see how the runaway couple are getting on, "Mrs. Harry Walmers, junior, fatigued, sir?" asks Cobbs. "Yes, she is tired, Cobbs; but she is not used to be away from home, and she has been in low spirits again. Cobbs, do you think you could bring a biffin, please?" — "I ask your pardon, sir, What was it you — — — ?" "I think a Norfolk biffin would rouse her, Cobbs." Restoratives of that kind, Boots would seem to have regarded as too essential to Mrs. Harry Walmers junior's happiness. Hence, when he comes upon the pair over their dinner of "biled fowl and bread-and-butter pudding," Boots privately owns that "he could have wished to have seen her more sensible to the voice of love, and less abandoning of herself to the currants in the pudding." According to Cobbs's own account of the gentleman, however, it should be added that he too could play his part very effectively at table, for — having mentioned another while, how the two of them had ordered overnight sweet milk-and-water and toast and currant jelly for breakfast — when Cobbs comes upon them the next morning at their meal, he describes Master Harry as sitting behind his breakfast cup "a tearing away at the jelly as if he had been his own father!"

Remorseful in the thought of betraying them, Boots at one moment declared, that rather than combine any longer against them, he would by preference "have had it out in half-a-dozen rounds with the governor!" And at another time, when the said governor had returned from York, "with Mr. Walmers and a elderly lady," Boots, while conducting Mr. Walmers upstairs, could not for the life of him help pausing at the room door, with, "I beg your pardon, sir, I hope you are not angry with Master Harry. For Master Harry's a fine boy, sir, and will do you credit and honour." Boots signifying while he related the circumstance, that "if the fine boy's father had contradicted him in the state of mind in which he then was, he should have 'fetched him a crack' and took the consequences." As for the appreciation of Master Harry by the female dependents at the Holly Tree, there were two allusions to that — one general, as may be said, the other particular — that were always the most telling hits, the two chief successes of the Reading. Who that once heard it, for example, has forgotten the Author's inimitable manner of saying, as the Boots — "The way in which the women of that house — without exception — every one of 'em — married and single — took to that boy when they heard the story, is surprising. It was as much as could be done to keep 'em from dashing into the room and kissing him. They climbed up all sorts of places, at the risk of their lives, to look at him through a pane of glass. They was seven deep at the key-hole!" The climax of fun came naturally at the close, however, when, having described how Mr. Walmers lifted his boy up to kiss the sleeping "little warm face of little Mrs. Harry Walmers, junior," at the moment of their separation, Boots, that is the Reader, cried out in the shrill voice of one of the chambermaids, "It's a shame to part 'em!"

Two reflections indulged in by Boots during the course of his narrative, being among the pleasantest in connection with this most graceful of all the purely comic Readings, may here, while closing these allusions to it, be recalled to mind not inappropriately. One — where Cobbs "wished with all his heart there was any impossible place where them two babies could have made an impossible marriage, and have lived impossibly happy ever afterwards." The other — where, with genial sarcasm, Boots propounds this brace of opinions by way of general summing up — "Firstly, that there are not many couples on their way to be married who are half as innocent as them two children. Secondly, that it would be a jolly good thing for a great many couples on their way to be married, if they could only be stopped in time, and brought back separate." With which cynical scattering of sugar-plums in the teeth, of married and single, the blithe Reading was laughingly brought to its conclusion.

BARBOX BROTHERS.

Nobody but the writer of this little freak of fancy could possibly have rendered the Reading of it in public worthy even of toleration. Perhaps no Reading that could be selected presents within the same compass so many difficulties to the audience who are listening, and to the Reader who is hardy enough to adventure upon its delivery. The closing incidents of the narrative are in themselves so improbable, we had all but said so impossible! Polly, at once so quaint and so captivating, when her words are perused upon the printed page, is so incapable of having her baby-prattle repeated by anybody else, without the imminent risk, the all but certainty, of its degenerating into mere childishness. It can scarcely be wondered, therefore, that "Barbox Brothers," though it actually was Read, and Read successfully, was hardly ever repeated. Everybody who has once looked into the story will bear in mind how, quite abruptly, almost haphazard, it comes to be narrated.

The lumbering, middle-aged, grey-headed hero of it, in obedience to the whim of a moment, gets out of a night train at the great central junction of the whole railway system of England. A drenching rain-storm and a windy platform, darkness and solitude are, to begin with, the agreeable surroundings of this eccentric traveller. He is stranded there, not high and dry, anything but that — on the contrary, soaked through and through, and at very low level indeed — during what the local officials regard as their deadeast time in all the twenty-four hours: what one of them, later on, terms emphatically their deadeast and buriedest time.

Already, even here, before the tale itself is in any way begun, the Author of it, in his capacity as Reader, somehow, by the mere manner of his delivery of a descriptive sentence or two, contrived to realise to his hearers in a wonderfully vivid way the strange incidents of the traffic in a scene like this, at those blackest intervals between midnight and daybreak. Now revealing — "Mysterious goods trains, covered with palls, and gliding on like vast weird funerals, conveying themselves guiltily away, as if their freight had come to a secret and unlawful end." Now, again — "Half miles of coal pursuing in a Detective manner, following when they led, stopping when they stopped, backing when they backed." One while the spectacle, conjured up by a word or two was that of — "Unknown languages in the air, conspiring in red, green, and white characters." Another, with startling effect, it was — "An earthquake, with thunder and lightning, going up express to London." Here it is that Barbox Brothers, in the midst of these ghostly apparitions, is eventually extricated from the melancholy plight in which he finds himself saturated and isolated in the middle of a spiderous web of railroads.

His extricator is — Lamps! A worthy companion portrait to that of cinderous Mr. Toodles, the stoker, familiar to the readers of Dombey. Characters, those two, quite as typical, after their fashion, of the later railway period of Dickens, as even Sam Weller, the boots, and Old Weller, the coachman, were of his earlier coaching period in the days of Pickwick. To see him, in his capacity as Lamps, when excited, take what he called "a rounder" — that is to say, giving himself, with his oily handkerchief rolled up in the form of a ball, "an elaborate smear from behind the right ear, up the cheek, across the forehead, and down the other cheek, behind his left ear," after which operation he is described as having shone exceedingly — was to be with him, again, at once, in his greasy little cabin, which was suggestive to the sense of smell of a cabin in a whaler. How it came to pass that Lamps sang comic songs, of his own composition, to his bed-ridden daughter Phoebe, by way of enlivening her solitude, and how Phoebe, while manipulating the threads on her lace-pillow, as though she were playing a musical instrument, taught her little band of children to chant to a pleasant tune the multiplication-table, and so fix it and other useful knowledge indelibly upon the tablets of their memory, the Author-Reader would then relate, as no other Reader, however gifted, who was not also the Author, would have been allowed to do, supposing this latter had had the hardihood to attempt the relation.

As the Reading advanced, the difficulties not only increased, they became tenfold, immediately upon the introduction of Polly. Dickens, however, conquered them all somehow. But to anybody else, setting forth the story histrionically, impersonating the characters as they appeared, these difficulties would by necessity have been insuperable or simply overwhelming. Catching the very little fair-haired girl's Christian name readily enough, when she comes up to him in the street, with the surprising announcement, "O! if you please, I am lost!" Barbox Brothers can't for the life of him conjecture what her surname is, — carefully imitating, though he does, the sound that comes from the childish lips, each time on its repetition. Hazzarding "Trivits," first of all, then "Paddens," then "Tappitarver." Eventually, when the two arrive hand-in-hand at Barbox Brothers' hotel, nobody there could make out her name as she set it forth, "except one chambermaid, who said it was Constantinople — which it wasn't."

No wonder Barbox feels bigger and heavier in person every minute when he is being catechised by Polly! Asked by her if he knows any stories, and compelled to answer, "No! What a dunce you must be, mustn't you?" says Polly. Frightened nearly out of his wits at the dinner-table, when they are feasting together, by her getting on her feet upon her chair to reward him with a kiss, and then toppling forward among the dishes — he himself crying out in dismay, "Gracious angels! Whew! I thought we were in the fire, Polly!" — "What a coward you are, ain't you?" says Polly, when replaced.

Upon the next morning, when brought down to breakfast, after a comfortable night's sleep, passed by the child in a bed shared with "the Constantinopolitan chambermaid," Polly, "by that time a mere heap of dimples," poses poor, unwieldy Barbox by asking him, in a wheedling manner, "What are we going to do, you dear old thing?" On his suggesting their having a sight, at the Circus, of two long-tailed ponies, speckled all over — "No, no, no!" cries Polly, in an ecstasy. When he afterwards throws out a proposition that they shall also look in at the toy-shop, and choose a doll — "Not dressed," ejaculates Polly; "No, no, no — not dressed!" Barbox replying, "Full dressed; together with a house, and all things necessary for housekeeping!" Polly gives a little scream, and seems in danger of falling into a swoon of bliss. "What a darling you are!" she languidly exclaims, leaning back in her chair: "Come and be hugged." All this will indicate plainly enough the difficulties investing every sentence of this Reading, capped as they all are by the astounding denouement of the plot — Polly turning out to be (sly little thing!) the purposely-lost daughter of Barbox Brothers' old love, Beatrice, and of her husband, Tresham, for whom Barbox had not only been jilted, but by whom Barbox had been simultaneously and rather heavily defrauded.

Perhaps the pleasantest recollection of the whole Reading is, not Polly — the small puss turns out to be such a cunningly reticent little emissary — but her Doll, a "lovely specimen of Circassian descent, possessing as much boldness of beauty as was reconcileable with extreme feebleness of mouth," and combining a sky-blue pelisse with rose-coloured satin trousers, and a black velvet hat, “the latter seemingly founded on the portraits of the late Duchess of Kent.” One is almost reconciled to Polly, however, — becoming oblivious for the moment of her connivance in her mother’s secret device, and reminiscent only of her own unsophisticated mixture of prattle and impertinence — on learning, immediately after this elaborate description of the gorgeous doll of her choice, that “the name of this distinguished foreigner was (on Polly’s authority) Miss Melluka.”

THE BOY AT MUGBY.

Several gamins have been contributed to our literature by Dickens — quite as typical and quite as truthful in their way, each of them, as Hugo's Gavroche. There is Jo the poor crossing-sweeper. There is the immortal Dodger. There is his pal the facetious Charley Bates. And there is that delightful boy at the end of "The Carol," who conveys such a world of wonder through his simple reply of "Why, Christmas Day!" The boy who is "as big," he says himself, as the prize turkey, and who gets off at last quicker than a shot propelled by the steadiest hand at a trigger! Scattered up and down the Boz fictions, there are abundant specimens of a genus that, in one instance, is actually termed by the Humorist, "a town-made little boy" — this is in the memorable street scene where Squeers hooks Smike by the coat-collar with the handle of his umbrella. He is always especially great in his delineation of what one might call the human cock-sparrows of London. Kit, at the outset of his career, is another example; and Tom Scott yet another.

Sloppy carries us away into the suburbs, thereby taking us in a manner off the stones, and otherwise represents in his own proper person, buttons and all, less one of the dapper urchins we are now more particularly referring to, than the shambling hobbledohoy. Even in the unfinished story with which the Author's voluminous writings were closed, there was portrayed an entirely novel specimen, one marked by the most grotesque extravagance, in the shape of that impish malignant, "the Deputy," whose pastime at once and whole duty in life seemed to be making a sort of vesper cock-shy of Durdles and his dinner-bundle.

Conspicuous among these comic boys of Dickens may be remembered one who, instead of being introduced in any of the Novelist's larger works, from the Pickwick Papers clown to Edwin Drood, interpolates himself, as may be said, among one of the groups of Christmas stories, through the medium of a shrill monologue. "The Boy at Mugby," to wit, the one exhilarated and exhilarating appreciate of the whole elaborate system of Refreshmenting in this Isle of the Brave and Land of the Free, by which he means to say Britannia.

Laconically, "I am the Boy at Mugby," he announces. "That's about what I am." His exact location he describes almost with the precision of one giving latitude and longitude — explaining to a nicety where his stand is taken. "Up in a corner of the Down Refreshment Room at Mugby Junction," in the height of twenty-seven draughts [he's counted 'em, he tells us parenthetically, as they brush the First Class, hair twenty-seven ways], bounded on the nor'-west by the beer, and so on. He himself, he frankly informs you — in the event of your ever presenting yourself there before him at the counter, in quest of nourishment of any kind, either liquid or solid — will seem not to hear you, and will appear "in a absent manner to survey the Line through a transparent medium composed of your head and body," determined evidently not to serve you, that is, as long as you can possibly bear it! "That's me!" cries the Boy at Mugby, exultantly, — adding, with an intense relish for his occupation, "what a delightful lark it is!" As for the eatables and drinkables habitually set forth upon the counter, by what he generally speaks of as the Refreshmenters, quoth the Boy at Mugby, in a naïf confidence, addressed to you in your capacity at once as applicant and victim, "when you're telegraphed, you should see 'em begin to pitch the stale pastry into the plates, and chuck the sawdust sang-wiches under the glass covers, and get out the — ha, ha! — the sherry — O, my eye, my eye! — for your refreshment." Once or twice in a way only, "The Boy at Mugby" was introduced among the Readings, and then merely as a slight stop-gap or interlude. Thoroughly enjoying the delivery of it himself, and always provoking shouts of laughter whenever this colloquial morsel was given, the Novelist seemed to be perfectly conscious himself that it was altogether too slight and trivial of its kind, to be worthy of anything like artistic consideration; that it was an "airy nothing" in its way, to which it was scarcely deserving that he should give more than name and local habitation.

Critically regarded, it had its inconsistencies too, both as a writing and as a Reading. There was altogether too much precocity for a genuine boy, in the nice discrimination with which the Boy at Mugby hit off the contrasting nationalities. The foreigner, for example, who politely, hat in hand, "beseeched Our Young Ladies, and our Missis," for a "leetel gloss hoif prarndee," and who, after being repelled, on trying to help himself, exclaims, "with hands clasped and shoulders riz: 'Ah! is it possible this; that these disdainous females are placed here by the administration, not only to empoison the voyagers, but to affront them! Great Heaven! How arrives it? The English people. Or is he then a slave? Or idiot?" "Hardly would a veritable boy, even an urchin so well "to the fore" with his epoch, as the Boy at Mugby, depict so accurately, much less take off, with a manner so entirely life-like, the astounded foreigner, any more than he would the thoroughly wide-awake and gaily derisive American. The latter he describes as alternately trying and spitting out first the sawdust and then the — ha, ha! — the sherry, until finally, on paying for both and consuming neither, he says, very loud, to Our Missis, and very good tempered, "I tell Yew what 'tis ma'arm. I la'af. Theer! I la'af, I Dew. I oughter ha' seen most things, for I hail from the unlimited side of the Atlantic Ocean, and I haive travelled right slick over the Limited, head on, through Jeerusalem and the East, and likeways France and Italy, Europe, Old World, and I am now upon the track to the Chief European Village; but such an Institution as Yew and Yewer fixins, solid and liquid, afore the glorious Tarnal I never did see yet! And if I hain't found the eighth wonder of Monarchical Creation, in finding Yew and Yewer fixins, solid and liquid, in a country where the people air not absolute Loo-naticks, I am Extra Double Darned with a nip and frizzle to the innermost grit! Wheerfore — Theer! — I la'af! I Dew, ma'arm. I la'af!" A calotype, or rather, literally, a speaking likeness, so true to the life as that, would be a trifle, we take it, beyond the mimetic powers and the keenly observant faculties even of a Boy whose senses had been wakened up by the twenty-seven cross draughts of the Refreshment Room at Mugby.

As to the fun made of the bandolining by Our Young Ladies, and of Our Missis's lecture on Foreign Refreshmenting, and of Sniff's corkscrew and his servile disposition, it is intentionally fooling, no doubt, but it is — excellent fooling! As was admirably said in the number of Macmillan for January, 1871, by the anonymous writer of a Reminiscence of the Amateur Theatricals at Tavistock House, — the remark following immediately after Charles Dickens's version of the Ghost's Song in Henry Fielding's burlesque of Tom Thumb, — "Nonsense, it may be said, all this; but the nonsense of a great genius has always something of genius in it." Had not Swift his "little language" to Stella, to "Stellakins," to "roguish, impudent, pretty M. D.?" Than some of which little language, quoth Thackeray, in commenting upon it, "I know of nothing more manly, more tender, more exquisitely touching." Again, had not Pope, in conjunction with the Dean, his occasional unbending also as a farceur, in the wilder freaks and oddities of Martinus Scriblerus? So was it here with one who was beyond all doubt, more intensely a Humorist than either, when he wrote or read such harmless sarcasms and innocent whimsicalities, as those alternately underlying, and overlaying the boyish fun of this juvenile Refreshment at Mugby Junction.

DOCTOR MARIGOLD.

Already mention has been made of the extraordinary care lavished, as a general rule, by the Novelist upon the preparation of these Readings before they were, each in turn, submitted for the first time to public scrutiny. A strikingly illustrative instance of this may be here particularised. It occurred upon the occasion of a purely experimental Reading of "Doctor Marigold," which came off privately, on the evening of the 18th of March, 1866, in the drawing-room of Charles Dickens's then town residence, in Southwick Place, Tyburnia. Including, among those present, the members of his own home circle, his entire audience numbered no more than ten persons altogether. Four, at any rate, of that party may be here identified, each of whom doubtless still bears the occasion referred to vividly in his remembrance, — Robert Browning the poet, Charles Fechter the actor, Wilkie Collins the novelist, and John Forster the historian of the Commonwealth. Even in private, Dickens had never Read "Doctor Marigold" until that evening. Often as he Read it afterwards, he never Read it with a more contagious air of exhilaration. He hardly ever, in fact, gave one of his almost wholly comic and but incidentally pathetic Readings so effectively. In every sentence there was a zest or relish that was irresistible. The volubility of the "poor chap in the sleeved-waistcoat" sped the Reading on with a rapidity quite beyond anticipation, when the time, which had been carefully marked at the commencement of the Reading, came to be notified at its conclusion. That the merest first rehearsal should have run off thus glibly seemed just simply incomprehensible. With the sense of this surprise still fresh upon us, the tentative Reading being at the time only a few seconds completed, everything was explained, however, by a half-whispered remark made, to the present writer, in passing, by the Novelist — made by him half-weariedly, yet half-laughingly — "There! If I have gone through that already to myself once, I have gone through it two — hundred — times!" It was not lightly or carelessly therefore, as may now be seen, that Charles Dickens, in his later capacity — not pen-in-hand, or through green monthly numbers, but standing at a reading-desk upon a public platform — undertook the office of a popular entertainer.

Resolved throughout his career as a Reader to acquit himself of those newly-assumed responsibilities to the utmost of his powers, to the fullest extent of his capabilities, both physical and intellectual, he applied his energies to the task, with a zeal that, it is impossible not to recognise now, amounted in the end to nothing less than (literally) self-sacrifice. But for the devotion of his energies thus unstintingly to the laborious task upon which he had adventured — a task involving in its accomplishment an enormous amount of rapid travelling by railway, keeping him for months together, besides, in one ceaseless whirl of bodily and mental excitement — his splendid constitution, sustained and strengthened as it was by his wholesome enjoyment of out-of-door life, and his habitual indulgence in bathing and pedes-trianism, gave him every reasonable hope of reaching the age of an octogenarian.

Bearing in mind in addition to the wear-and-tear of the Readings in England and America, the nervous shock of that terrible railway accident at Staplehurst, on the 9th of June, 1865, the lamentable catastrophe of exactly five years afterwards to the very day, that of the 9th of June, 1870, becomes readily comprehensible. Because of his absorption in his task, however, all through, he was unconscious for the most part of the wasting influence of his labours, or, if he was so at all towards the close of his career, he was so, even then, only fitfully and at the rarest intervals. Precisely in the same way, it may be remarked, in regard to those who watched his whole course as a Reader, that so facile and so pleasureable to himself, as well as to them, appeared to be the novel avocation which had come of late years to be alternated with his more accustomed toil as an author, that it rendered even the most observant amongst them unconscious in their turn of the disastrously exhausting influence of this unnatural blending together of two professions. A remorseful sense of this comes back upon us now, when it is all too late, in our remembrance of that remark made by the Novelist immediately after the Private Reading of "Doctor Marigold," a remark then regarded as simply curious and interesting, but now having about it an almost painful significance. Never was work more thoroughly or more conscientiously done, from first to last, than in the instance of these Readings.

In the minute elaboration of the care with which they were prepared, in the vivacity with which they were one and all of them delivered, in the punctuality with which, whirled like a shuttle in a loom, to and fro, hither and thither, through all parts of the United Kingdom and of the United States, the Reader kept, link by link, an immensely-lengthened chain of appointments, until the first link was broken suddenly at Preston — one can recognise at length the full force of those simple words uttered by him upon the occasion of his Farewell Reading, where he spoke of himself as “a faithful servant of the public, always imbued with a sense of duty to them, and always striving to do his best.” Among the many radiant illustrations that have been preserved of how thoroughly he did his best, not the least brilliant in its way was this eminently characteristic Reading of “Doctor Mari-gold.”

All through it, from the very beginning down to the very end of his Confidences, the Cheap Jack, in his belcher neckcloth and his sleeved-waistcoat with the mother-o’-pearl buttons, was there talking to us, as only he could talk to us, from the foot-board of his cart. He remained thus before us from his first mention of his own father having always consistently called himself Willum to the moment when little Sophy — the third little Sophy — comes clambering up the steps, and reveals that she at least is not deaf and dumb by crying out to him, “Grandfather!” As for the patter of Doctor Marigold, it is among the humorous revelations of imaginative literature. Hear him when he is perhaps the best worth listening to, when he is in his true rostrum, when his bluchers are on his native foot-board, and his name is, more intensely than ever, Doctor Marigold! Don’t we all remember him there, for example, on a Saturday night in the market-place — ”Here’s a pair of razors that’ll shave you closer than the board of guardians; here’s a flat-iron worth its weight in gold; here’s a frying-pan artificially flavoured with essence of beefsteaks to that degree that you’ve only got for the rest of your lives to fry bread and dripping in it and there you are replete with animal food; here’s a genuine chronometer-watch, in such a solid silver case that you may knock at the door with it when you come home late from a social meeting, and rouse your wife and family and save up your knocker for the postman; and here’s half a dozen dinner-plates that you may play the cymbals with to charm the baby when it’s fractious. Stop! I’ll throw you in another article, and I’ll give you that, and it’s a rolling-pin; and if the baby can only get it well into it’s mouth when its teeth is coming, and rub the gums once with it, they’ll come through double in a fit of laughter equal to being tickled.” And so on, ringing the changes on a thousand wonderful conceits and whimsicalities that come tumbling out one after another in inexhaustible sequence and with uninterrupted volubility.

The very Prince of Cheap Jacks, surely, is this Doctor Marigold! And, more than that, one who makes good his claim to the title of wit, humorist, satirist, philanthropist, and philosopher.

As for his philosophic contentment, what can equal that as implied in his summing up of his own humble surroundings? “A roomy cart, with the large goods hung outside, and the bed slung underneath it when on the road; an iron-pot and a kettle, a fireplace for the cold weather, a chimney for the smoke, a hanging-shelf and a cupboard, a dog and a horse. What more do you want? You draw off on a bit of turf in a green lane or by the roadside, you hobble your old horse and turn him grazing, you light your fire upon the ashes of the last visitors, you cook your stew, and you wouldn’t call the Emperor of France your father.”

As for his wit, hear him describe — “What? Why, I’ll tell you! It’s made of fine gold, and it’s not broke, though there’s a hole in the middle of it, and it’s stronger than any fetter that was ever forged. What else is it? I’ll tell you. It’s a hoop of solid gold wrapped in a silver curl-paper that I myself took off the shining locks of the ever-beautiful old lady in Threadneedle Street, London city. I wouldn’t tell you so, if I hadn’t the paper to show, or you mightn’t believe it even of me. Now, what else is it? It’s a man-trap, and a hand-cuff, the parish stocks and a leg-lock, all in gold and all in one. Now, what else is it? It’s a wedding-ring!”

As for something far better than any mere taste of his skill as a satirist, see the whole of his delectable take off — in contradistinction to himself, the itinerant Cheap Jack — of the political Dear Jack in the public marketplace.

As for his philanthropy, it is unobtrusively proclaimed by the drift of his whole narrative, and especially by two or three among the more remarkable of its closing incidents.

As for his powers as a humorist, they may be found there passim, being scattered broadcast all through his autobiographic recollections.

To those recollections are we not indebted for a whole gallery of inimitable delineations? The Cheap Jack’s very dog, for instance, who had taught himself out of his own head to growl at any person in the crowd that bid as low as sixpence! Or Pickleson the giant, with a little head and less in it. Of whom, observes Doctor Marigold, “He was a languid young man, which I attribute to the distance betwixt his extremities.” About whom, when a sixpence is given to him by Doctor Marigold, the latter remarks in a preposterous parenthesis, “(for he was kept as short as he was long!)” As for Dickens’s high falsetto, when speaking in the person of this same Pickleson, with a voice that, as Doctor Marigold says, seemed to come from his eyebrows, it was only just a shade more excruciatingly ridiculous than his guttural and growling objurgations in the character of the giant’s proprietor, the fe-rocious Mim.

With all his modest appetite for the simpler pleasures of existence, Doctor Marigold betrays in one instance, by the way, the taste of a gourmet. “I knocked up a beefsteak-pudding for one,” he says, “with two kidneys, a dozen oysters, and a couple of mushrooms thrown in:” adding, with a fine touch of nature drawn from experience, “It’s a pudding to put a man in good humour with everything, except the two bottom buttons of his waistcoat.”

Incomparably the finest portion of all this wonderfully original sketch of Doctor Marigold, both in the Writing and in the Reading, was that in which the poor Cheap Jack is represented as going through his customary patter on the foot-board with his poor little Sophy — the first of the three Sophies, his own by birth, and not simply by adoption — the while she is slowly dying on his shoulder. Thackeray was right when he said of the humour of Dickens, “It is a mixture of love and wit.” Laughter and tears, with him, lay very near — speaking of him as an author, we may say by preference — lie very near indeed together. It is in those passages in which they come in astonishingly rapid alternation, and at moments almost simultaneously, that he is invariably at his very best. The incident here alluded to is one of these more exquisite descriptions, and it was one, that, by voice and look and manner, he himself most exquisitely delineated. When the poor Cheap Jack, with Sophy holding round his neck, steps out from the shelter of the cart upon the foot-board, and the waiting crowd all set up a laugh on seeing them — “one chuckle-headed Joskin (that I hated for it) making a bid ‘tuppence for her!’” — Doctor Marigold begins his tragi-comic allocution. It is sown thickly all through with the most whimsical of his conceits, but it is interrupted also here and there with infinitely pathetic touches of tenderness.

Fragmentary illustrations of either would but dimly shadow forth, instead of clearly elucidating, what is here meant in the recollection of those who can still recall this Reading of “Doctor Marigold” to their remembrance.

Those who never heard it as it actually fell from the Author's lips, by turning to the original sketch, and running through that particular portion of it to themselves, may more readily conjecture than by the aid of mere piecemeal quotation, all that the writer of those riant and tearful pages would be capable of accomplishing by its utterance, bringing to its delivery, as he could, so many of the rarer gifts of genius, and so many also of the rarest accomplishments of art.

SIKES AND NANCY.

On Saturday, the 14th of November, 1868, there were assembled together in front of the great platform in St. James's Hall, Piccadilly, as fit audience, but few, somewhere about fifty of the critics, artists, and literary men of London. A card of invitation, stamped with a facsimile of the well-known autograph of Charles Dickens, and countersigned by the Messrs. Chappell and Company, had, with a witty significance, bidden them to that rendezvous for a "Private Trial of the Murder in Oliver Twist." The occasion, in point of fact, was a sort of experimental rehearsal of the last and most daring of all these vividly dramatic Readings by the popular Novelist.

Conscious himself that there was a certain amount of audacity in his adventuring thus upon a delineation so really startling in its character, he was not unnaturally desirous of testing its fitness for representation before the public, first of all in the presence of those who were probably the best qualified to pronounce a perfectly dispassionate opinion. It certainly appeared somewhat dubious at the first, that question as to the suitability for portrayal before mixed assemblages, of one of the most powerfully tragic incidents ever depicted by him in the whole range of his voluminous contributions to imaginative literature. The passages selected to this end from his famous story of Oliver Twist were those relating more particularly to the Murder of Nancy by Bill Sikes. A ghastlier atrocity than that murder could hardly be imagined. In the book itself, as will be remembered, the crime is painted as with a brush dipped in blood rather than pigment. The infamous deed is there described in language worthy of one of the greatest realists in fictitious narrative. Henri de Balzac, even in his more sanguinary imaginings, never showed a completer mastery of the horrible.

Remembering all this, and feeling perfectly assured at the same time, that the scene then about to be depicted by the Author in person, would most certainly lose nothing of its terror in the representation, the acknowledgment may here be made by the writer of these pages, that, on entering the Hall that evening, he was in considerable doubt as to what might be the result of the experiment. Compared with the size of the enormous building, the group of those assembled appeared to be the merest handful of an audience clustered together towards the front immediately below the platform of the orchestra. Standing at the back of this group, the writer recalls to mind, in regard to that evening, a circumstance plainly enough indicating how fully his own unexpressed uncertainty was akin to that of the Author-Reader himself. The circumstance, namely, that Charles Dickens, immediately on entering the hall, before taking his place at his reading-desk upon the platform, came round, and after exchanging a few words with him, uttered this earnest Aside, — "I want you to watch this particularly, for I am very doubtful about it myself!" Before that Experimental Reading was half over, however, all doubt upon the matter was utterly dissipated. In the powerful effect of it, the murder-scene immeasurably surpassed anything he had ever achieved before as an impersonator of his own creations. In its climax, it was as splendid a piece of tragic acting as had for many years been witnessed.

What, in effect, was Macready's comment upon it some months afterwards, when, with an especial eye to the great tragedian's opinion, "Sikes and Nancy" was given at Cheltenham? It was laconic enough, but it afforded a world of pleasure to the Author-Actor when his old friend — himself the hero of so many tragic triumphs — summed up his estimate, by saying, characteristically, "Two Macbeths!"

Four of the imaginary beings of the novel were introduced, or, it should rather be said, were severally produced before us as actual embodiments. Occasionally, during one of the earlier scenes, it is true that the gentle voice of Rose Maylie was audible, while a few impressive words were spoken there also at intervals by Mr. Brownlow. But, otherwise, the interlocutors were four, and four only: to wit — Nancy, Bill Sikes, Morris Bolter, otherwise Noah Claypole, and the Jew Fagin. Than those same characters no four perhaps in the whole range of fiction could be more widely contrasted. Yet, widely contrasted, utterly dissimilar, though they are, in themselves, the extraordinary histrionic powers of their creator, enabled him to present them to view, with a rapidity of sequence or alternation, so astonishing in its mingled facility and precision, that the characters themselves seemed not only to be before us in the flesh, but sometimes one might almost have said were there simultaneously. Each in turn as portrayed by him — meaning portrayed by him not simply in the book but by himself in person — was in its way a finished masterpiece.

Looking at the Author as he himself embodied these creations — Fagin, the Jew, was there completely, audibly, visibly before us, by a sort of transformation! Here, in effect — as several years previously in the midst of his impersonation of Wilmot in Lord Lytton's comedy of Not so Bad as we Seem, namely, where, in the garret, the young patrician affects for a while to be Edmund Curll the bookseller — the impersonator's very stature, each time Fagin opened his lips, seemed to be changed instantaneously. Whenever he spoke, there started before us — high-shouldered, with contracted chest, with birdlike claws, eagerly anticipating by their every movement the passionate words fiercely struggling for utterance at his lips — that most villainous old tutor of young thieves, receiver of stolen goods, and very devil incarnate: his features distorted with rage, his penthouse eyebrows (those wonderful eyebrows!) working like the antennæ of some deadly reptile, his whole aspect, half-vulpine, half-vulture-like, in its hungry wickedness.

Whenever he spoke, again, Morris Bolter — quite as instantly, just as visibly and as audibly — was there upon the platform. Listening to him, though we were all of us perfectly conscious of doing, through the Protean voice, and looking at him through the variable features of the Novelist, we somehow saw, no longer the Novelist, but — each time Noah Clay-pole said a word — that chuckle-headed, long-limbed, clownish, sneaking varlet, who is the spy on Nancy, the tool of Fagin, and the secret evil-genius of Sikes, hounding the latter on, as he does, unwittingly, to the dreadful deed of homicide.

As for the Author's embodiment of Sikes — the burly ruffian with thews of iron and voice of Stentor — it was only necessary to hear that infuriated voice, and watch the appalling blows dealt by his imaginary bludgeon in the perpetration of the crime, to realise the force, the power, the passion, informing the creative mind of the Novelist at once in the original conception of the character, and then, so many years afterwards, in its equally astonishing representation.

It was in the portrayal of Nancy, however, that the genius of the Author-Actor found the opportunity, beyond all others, for its most signal manifestation. Only that the catastrophe was in itself, by necessity so utterly revolting, there would have been something exquisitely pathetic in many parts of that affecting delineation. The character was revealed with perfect consistency throughout — from the scene of suppressed emotion upon the steps of London Bridge, when she is scared with the eltrich horror of her forebodings, down to her last gasping, shrieking apostrophes, to “Bill, clear Bill,” when she sinks, blinded by blood, under the murderous blows dealt upon her upturned face by her brutal paramour.

Then, again, the horror experienced by the assassin afterwards! So far as it went, it was as grand a reprehension of all murderers as hand could well have penned or tongue have uttered. It had about it something of the articulation of an avenging voice not against Sikes only, but against all who ever outraged, or ever dreamt of outraging, the sanctity of human life. And it was precisely this which tended to sublimate an incident otherwise of the ghastliest horror into a homily of burning eloquence, the recollection of which among those who once saw it revealed through the lips, the eyes, the whole aspect of Charles Dickens will not easily be obliterated. The moral drawn from it — and there was this moral interpenetrating or impregnating the whole — became appreciable, it might even have been by Sikes himself, from the first moment the ruffian realised that the crime had been actually accomplished. It spoke trumpet-tongued from the very instant when he recoiled from “it!” Nancy no more, but thenceforth flesh and blood — “But such flesh, and so much blood!” Nevertheless, in that Experimental Reading of the 14th of November, 1868, the effect of all this appeared, in the estimation of the present writer, to have been in a great measure marred by the abruptness with which, almost the instant after the crime had been committed, the Reading was terminated. Sikes burnt upon the hearth the blood-stained weapon with which the murder had been perpetrated — -was startled for a moment by the hair upon the end of the club shrinking to a light cinder and whirling up the chimney — and then, dragging the dog (whose very feet were bloody) after him, and locking the door, left the house. There, the Experimental Reading abruptly terminated. It seemed not only insufficient, but a lost opportunity. Insomuch, that the writer, on the following day, remonstrated with the Novelist as earnestly as possible, urging him to append to the Reading as it then stood some fragmentary portion, at least, of the chapter descriptive of the flight, so that the remorseful horror of Sikes might be more fully realised. Of the reasonableness of this objection, however, Dickens himself was so wholly unconvinced, that, in the midst of his arguments against it, he wrote, in a tone of good-humoured indignation, “My dear fellow, believe me that no audience on earth could be held for ten minutes after the girl’s death. Give them time, and they would be revengeful for having had such a strain put upon them. Trust me to be right. I stand there, and I know.” Than this nothing could very well have been more strongly expressed, as indicative of the conclusion at which he had deliberately arrived.

So frankly open to conviction was he, nevertheless, that, not disdaining to defer to the judgment of another when his own had been convinced, the Reading was eventually, after all, lengthened out by a very remarkable addition. The printed copy of this fragment of Oliver Twist, artistically compacted together as “A Reading,” has, appended to it, in blue ink, three pages of manuscript in the Novelist’s familiar handwriting, in which, with a cunning mastery of all the powers of condensation, he has compacted together in a few sentences what he always gave with wonderful effect before the public, the salient incidents of the murderer’s flight, ending with his own destruction, and even his dog’s, from the housetop.

Nothing that could most powerfully realise to the audience the ruffian’s sense of horror and abhorrence has been there overlooked. The ghastly figure follows him everywhere. He hears its garments rustling in the leaves. “If he stopped, it stopped. If he ran, it followed.” Turning at times to beat the phantom off, though it should strike him dead, the hair rises on his head, and his blood stands still, for it has turned with him and is behind him! Throwing himself on his back upon the road — “At his head it stood, silent, erect, and still: a human gravestone with its epitaph in Blood.”

What is as striking as anything in all this Reading, however — that is, in the Reading copy of it now lying before us as we write — is the mass of hints as to byplay in the stage directions for himself, so to speak, scattered up and down the margin. “Fagin raised his right hand, and shook his trembling forefinger in the air,” is there, on p. 101, in print. Beside it, on the margin in MS., is the word “Action.” Not a word of it was said. It was simply done. Again, immediately below that on the same page — Sikes’ loquitur — ““Oh! you haven’t, haven’t you?” passing a pistol into a more convenient pocket [‘Action,’ again, in MS. on the margin.]” That’s lucky for one of us — which one that is don’t matter.”“ Not a word was said about the pistol — the marginal direction was simply attended to. On the opposite page, in print, “Fagin laid his hand upon the bundle, and locked it in the cupboard. But he did not take his eyes off the robber for an instant.” On the margin in MS., oddly but significantly underlined, are the words, “Cupboard Action.” So again afterwards, as a rousing self-direction, one sees notified in manuscript, on p. 107, the grim stage direction, “Murder Coming.”

As certainly as the “Trial from Pickwick” was the most laughter-moving of all the Readings, and as the “Story of Little Dombey,” again, was the most pathetic, “Sikes and Nancy” was in all respects the most powerfully dramatic and, in the grand tragic force of it, in many ways, the most impressive and remarkable.

THE FAREWELL READING.

In recording the incident of his Farewell Reading, there comes back to us a yet later recollection of the great Novelist; and illustrating, as it does, his passionate love for the dramatic art, it may here be mentioned not inappropriately.

It relates simply to a remark suddenly made by him — and which had been suggested, so far as we can remember, by nothing we had been talking about previously — towards the close of our very last suburban walk together. Going round by way of Lambeth one afternoon in the early summer of 1870, we had skirted the Thames along the Surrey bank, had crossed the river higher up, and on our way back were returning at our leisure through Westminster; when, just as we were approaching the shadow of the old Abbey at Poet's Corner, under the roof-beams of which he was so soon to be laid in his grave, with a rain of tears and flowers, he abruptly asked —

“What do you think would be the realisation of one of my most cherished day-dreams?” Adding, instantly, without waiting for airy answer, “To settle down now for the remainder of my life within easy distance of a great theatre, in the direction of which I should hold supreme authority. It should be a house, of course, having a skilled and noble company, and one in every way magnificently appointed. The pieces acted should be dealt with according to my pleasure, and touched up here and there in obedience to my own judgment; the players as well as the plays being absolutely under my command. There,” said he, laughingly, and in a glow at the mere fancy, “that's my daydream!”

Dickens's delighted enjoyment, in fact, of everything in any way connected with the theatrical profession, was second only to that shown by him in the indulgence of the master-passion of his life, his love of literature.

The way in which he threw himself into his labours, as a Reader, was only another indication of his intense affection for the dramatic art. For, as we have already insisted, the Readings were more than simply Readings, they were in the fullest meaning of the words singularly ingenious and highly elaborated histrionic performances. And his sustained success in them during fifteen years altogether, and, as we have seen, through as many as five hundred representations, may be accounted for in the same way as his still more prolonged success, from the beginning of his career as a Novelist down to its very close, from the Pickwick Papers to Edwin Drood, otherwise, during an interval of four-and-thirty consecutive years, as the most popular author of his generation.

The secret of his original success, and of the long sustamment of it in each of these two careers — as Writer and as Reader — is in a great measure discoverable in this, that whatever powers he possessed he applied to their very uttermost. Whether as Author or as Impersonator, he gave himself up to his appointed task, not partially or intermittingly, but thoroughly and indefatigably.

His rule in life, in this way, he has himself clearly explained in the forty-second chapter of David Copperfield. What he there says about David's industry and perseverance, applies as directly to himself, as what he also relates in regard to his young hero's earlier toils as a parliamentary reporter, and his precocious fame as a writer of fiction. Speaking at once for David and for himself, he there writes for both or for either, "Whatever I have tried to do in life, I have tried with all my heart to do well; whatever I have devoted myself to, I have devoted myself to completely; in great aims and in small I have always been thoroughly in earnest. I have never believed it possible that any natural or improved ability can claim immunity from the companionship of the steady, plain, hard-working qualities, and hope to gain its end. There is no substitute for thorough-going, ardent, and sincere earnestness. Never to put one hand to anything on which I could throw my whole self; and never to affect depreciation of my work, whatever it was, I find now to have been my golden rules." What is there said applies far more recognisably to the real Charles Dickens than to the imaginary David Copperfield.

Attestations of the truth of this were discoverable, at every turn, in regard to his regular system, his constant method, nay, his minutest tricks of habit, so to speak, both as Reader and as Novelist. It was so when as an Author, for example, note was taken, now of his careful forecast of a serial tale on as many slips as there were to be green monthly numbers; now of his elaborately corrected and recorrected manuscripts; now of the proof-sheets lying about, for revision at any and every spare moment, during the month immediately before publication. Or, when, on the other hand, in his capacity as a Reader, regard was had to the scrupulous exactitude with which the seemingly trivial minutiae of what one might call the mere accompaniments, were systematically cared for or methodised. Announced to read, for instance, for the first time in some town he had never before visited for that purpose, or in some building in which his voice had never before been raised, he would go down to the empty hall long before the hour appointed for the Reading, to take the bearings, as he would say, or, in other words, to familiarise himself with the place beforehand. His interest in his audience, again, was something delightful. He was hardly less keenly observant of them than they of him. Through a hole in the curtain at the side, or through a chink in the screen upon the platform, he would eagerly direct your attention to what never palled upon his own, namely, the effect of the suddenly brightened sea of faces on the turning up of the gas, immediately before the moment of his own appearance at the reading-desk.

The evening at length came for his very last appearance at that familiar little reading-desk, on Tuesday, the 15th of March, 1870, on the platform of the St. James's Hall, Piccadilly. The largest audience ever assembled in that immense building, the largest, as already intimated, that ever can be assembled there for purely Reading purposes, namely, when the orchestra and the upper end of the two side-galleries have necessarily to be barred or curtained off from the auditorium, were collected together there under the radiant pendants of the glittering ceiling, every available nook and corner, and all the ordinary gangways of the Great Hall being completely occupied. The money value of the house that night was £422. Crowds were unable to obtain admittance at the entrances in the Quadrant and in Piccadilly, long before the hour fixed for the Farewell Reading. Inside the building 2034 persons were seated there, eagerly awaiting the Novelist's appearance. The enthusiasm of his reception when eight o'clock came, and he advanced to the centre of the platform, of itself told plainly enough, as plainly as the printed hills announcing the fact in red, back, and yellow, that it was his last appearance.

The Readings selected were, as the very best that could have been chosen, his own favourites — "The Christmas Carol," and the "Trial from Pickwick." He never read better in his life than he did on that last evening. Evidently enough, he was nerved to a crowning effort. And by sympathy his audience — his last audience — responded to him throughout by their instant and intense appreciation. Not a point was lost. Every good thing told to the echo, that is, through the echoing laughter. Scrooge, Fezziwig, the Fiddler, Topper, every one of the Cratchits, everybody in “The Carol,” including the Small Boy who is so great at repartee, all were welcomed in turn, as became them, with better than acclamations. It was the same exactly with the “Trial from Pickwick” — Justice Stareleigh, Serjeant Buzfuz, Mr. Winkle, Mrs. Cluppins, Sam Weller, one after another appearing for a brief interval, and then disappearing for ever, each of them a delightfully humorous, one of them in particular, the Judge, a simply incomparable impersonation.

Then came the moment of parting between the great Author and his audience — that last audience who were there as the representatives of his immense public in both hemispheres. When the resounding applause that greeted the close of that Final Reading had died out, there was a breathless hush as Charles Dickens, who had for once lingered there upon the platform, addressed to his hearers, with exquisitely clear articulation, but with unmistakably profound emotion, these few and simple words of farewell: —

- “Ladies and Gentlemen, — It would be worse than
- “idle, for it would be hypocritical and unfeeling, if I
- “were to disguise that I close this episode in my life
- “with feelings of very considerable pain. For some
- “fifteen years in this hall, and in many kindred places,
- “I have had the honour of presenting my own che-
- “rished ideas before you for your recognition, and in
- “closely observing your reception of them have en-
- “joyed an amount of artistic delight and instruction,
- “which perhaps it is given to few men to know. In
- “this task and in every other I have ever undertaken
- “as a faithful servant of the public, always imbued
- “with the sense of duty to them, and always striving
- “to do his best, I have been uniformly cheered by the
- “readiest response, the most generous sympathy, and
- “the most stimulating support. Nevertheless, I have
- “thought it well, at the full flood-tide of your favour,
- “to retire upon those older associations between us,
- “which date from much further back than these,
- “thenceforth to devote myself exclusively to the art
- “that first brought us together. Ladies and gentle-

- "men, in two short weeks from this time I hope that
- "you may enter, in your own homes, on a new series
- "of readings at which my assistance will be indispen-
- "sable ; but from these garish lights I vanish now for
- "evermore, with a heartfelt, grateful, respectful, and
- "affectionate fare well."

The manly, cordial voice only faltered once at the very last. The mournful modulation of it in the utterance of the words, "From these garish lights I vanish now for evermore" lingers to this moment like a haunting melody in our remembrance. Within a few weeks afterwards those very words were touchingly inscribed on the Funeral Card distributed at the doors of Westminster Abbey on the day of the Novelist's interment in Poet's Corner. As he moved from the platform after the utterance of the last words of his address and, with his head drooping in emotion, passed behind the screen on his way to his retiring-room, a cordial hand was placed for one moment with a sympathetic grasp upon his shoulder. The popularity won by Charles Dickens, even among the million who never saw him or spoke with him, amounted to nothing less than personal affection. Among his friends and intimates no great author has ever been more truly or more tenderly beloved. The prolonged thunder of applause that followed him to his secluded room at the back of the platform, whither he had withdrawn alone, recalled him after the lapse of some minutes for another instant into the presence of his last audience, from whom, with a kiss of his hand, he then indeed parted for evermore.

PICKWICK AND THE “GEORGE” INN

PREFACE

It is not claimed for this book that it supplies a long-felt want, or that it is at all necessary to the better understanding of the immortal work which inspired it. Nor does the author offer any apology for adding yet another volume to the long list of books, already existing, which deal in some way or other with England's classic book of humour, because it isn't so much his fault as might appear on the surface.

A year or two ago he contributed to an American paper a series of twenty articles on some of the prominent inns mentioned in the works of Dickens, and before the series was completed he received many overtures to publish them in volume form. To do so would have resulted in producing an entirely inadequate and incomplete book, whose sins of omission would have far outrun its virtues, whatever they might have been.

As an alternative, he set himself the task of dealing with the inns and taverns mentioned in The Pickwick Papers alone, grafting certain of those articles into their proper place in the scheme of the book, and leaving, perhaps, for a future volume, should such be warranted, the inns mentioned in other books of the novelist. If the reading of this volume affords half the pleasure and interest the writer has derived from compiling it, the overtures would then seem to have been justified, and the book's existence proved legitimate.

Needless to say, numerous works of reference have been consulted for facts, and the writer's indebtedness to them is hereby acknowledged.

He also desires to record his grateful thanks to Mr. Charles G. Harper for permission to reproduce several of his drawings from his invaluable book on The Old Inns of Old England; to the proprietors of The Christian Science Monitor for allowing him to reproduce some of the pictures drawn by Mr. L. Walker for the series of articles which appeared in that paper; to Mr. T. W. Tyrrell, Mr. Anthony J. Smith, and Mr. T. Fisher Unwin for the loan of photographs and pictures of which they own the copyright.

THE INNS AND TAVERNS OF “PICKWICK”

CHAPTER I

“PICKWICK” AND THE COACHING AGE

Dickens, like all great authors, had a tendency to underestimate the value of his most popular book. At any rate, it is certainly on record that he thought considerably more of some of his other works than he did of the immortal Pickwick. But The Pickwick Papers has maintained its place through generations, and retains it to-day, as the most popular book in our language — a book unexampled in our literature. There are persons who make a yearly custom of reading it; others who can roll off pages of it from memory; scores who can answer any meticulous question in an examination of its contents; and a whole army ready and waiting to correct any misquotation that may appear in print from its pages. All its curiosities, lapses, oddities, anachronisms, slips and misprints have been discovered by commentators galore, and the number of books it has brought into existence is stupendous.

What the secret of its popularity is would take a volume to make manifest; but in a word, one might attribute it to its vividness of reality — to the fact that every character seems to be a real living being, with whose minute peculiarities we are made familiar in a singularly droll and happy manner. With each we become close friends on first acquaintance, and as episode succeeds episode the friendship deepens, with no thought that our friends are mere imaginary creatures of the author's brain.

It does not matter if the adventures of these amiable and jovial beings are boisterously reckless at times, or if they indulge in impossible probabilities. Their high spirited gaiety and inexhaustible fun and humour and their overflow of good-nature stifles criticism.

Dickens's object in writing The Pickwick Papers he assured us in the preface was “to place before the reader a constant succession of characters and incidents; to paint them in as vivid colours as he could command, and to render them, at the same time, life-like and amusing.” All this he succeeded in doing with such amazing success that we have a masterly picture of English life of the period to be found in no other book. The secret of the book's popularity and fame is in its unaffected and flowing style, its dramatic power, and, of course, its exuberant humour.

But there is much for serious reflection in its pages as well, and one could dilate at length on the propaganda which is so thinly camouflaged throughout; propaganda against lawyers, prisons, corruption in Parliament, celebrity hunting, pomposity, fraud, hypocrisy and all uncharitableness in the abstract; but all this is wrapped up in the same way that such things are done in all the fairy tales of which Pickwick is one of the best.

There are, as a fact, innumerable reasons why Pickwick is so popular, so necessary to-day. The one which concerns us more at the moment is its appeal as a mirror of the manners and customs of a romantic age which has fast receded from us. It is, perhaps, the most accurate picture extant of the old coaching era and all that was corollary to it. No writer has done more than Dickens to reflect the glory of that era, and the glamour and comfort of the old inns of England which in those days were the havens of the road to every traveller. All his books abound in pleasant and faithful pictures of the times, and alluring and enticing descriptions of those old hostelries where not only ease was sought and expected, but obtained; Pickwick is packed with them.

The outside appearance of an inn alone was in those times so well considered that it addressed a cheerful front towards the traveller "as a home of entertainment ought, and tempted him with many mute but significant assurances of a comfortable welcome." Its very signboard promised good cheer and meant it; the attractive furnishing of the homely windows, the bright flowers on the sills seemed to beckon one to "come in"; and when one did enter, one was greeted and cared for as a guest and not merely as a customer.

We all know, as Dickens has reminded us elsewhere, the great station hotel, belonging to the company of proprietors which has suddenly sprung up in any place we like to name, ". . . in which we can get anything we want, after its kind, for money; but where nobody is glad to see us, or sorry to see us, or minds (our bill paid) whether we come or go, or how, or when, or why, or cares about us . . . where we have no individuality, but put ourselves into the general post, as it were, and are sorted and disposed of according to our division." That is more the modern method and is in direct contrast to the old coaching method, which, alas! may never return, of which the inns in Pickwick furnish us with glowing examples.

We certainly are coming back to these roadside inns in the present age of rapid motor transit; yet we are in too much of a tearing hurry to make the same use of the old inns as they did in the more leisurely age.

We believe these old inns attract to-day not only because of their quaintness and the old-world atmosphere which adheres to them, but because of the tradition which clings to them; and the most popular tradition of all, and the one of which the proprietors are most proud, is the Dickens tradition.

There are scores of such inns in the city of London and throughout the country whose very names immediately conjure up some merry scene in his books and revive never-to-be-forgotten memories of exhilarating incidents.

Time, the devastating builder, and the avaricious landlord have played havoc with many. Several, however, remain to tell their own tale, whilst the memory of others is sustained by a modern building bearing the old name, all of which are landmarks for the Dickens lover.

Many of them, of course, existed only in the novelist's fertile imagination; but most of them had foundation in reality, and most of them, particularly in Pickwick, are mentioned by name and have become immortal in consequence; and were it not for the popularity of his writings, their fame in many instances would have deserted them and their glory have departed.

Inns, hotels and wayside public-houses play a most important part in The Pickwick Papers, and many of the chief scenes are enacted within their walls. The book, indeed, opens in an hotel and ends in one. The first scene arising from the projected "journeys and investigations" of those four distinguished members of the Club took place in an hotel, or — to speak correctly — outside one, namely, the "Golden Cross" at Charing Cross. There is even an earlier reference to a public-house near St. Martin's le Grand, from where the "first cab was fetched," whilst the last important incident of the book was enacted in another, the Adelphi Hotel off the Strand, when Mr. Pickwick announced his determination to retire into private life at Dulwich.

In the ensuing pages, the Pickwickians are followed in the tours they made in pursuit of adventure, and the inns and taverns they stopped at are taken in the order of their going and coming. With each is recalled the story, adventure, or scene associated with it, and if it has any history of its own apart from that gained through the book, record is made of the facts concerning it.

The Pickwick Papers was completed in 1837, and a dinner was given to celebrate the event, at which Dickens himself presided and his friend, Serjeant T. N. Talfourd, to whom the book was dedicated, acted as vice-chairman. Ainsworth, Forster, Lover, Macready, Jerdan and other close friends were invited, and the dinner took place at The Prince of Wales Coffee House and Hotel in Leicester Place, Leicester Square.

It is very curious that no extended account of this historic event exists. Forster, in his biography of the novelist, beyond saying that “everybody in hearty good-humour with every other body,” and that “our friend Ainsworth was of the company,” is otherwise silent over the event. There is certainly a reference to the dinner in a letter from Dickens to Macready, dated from “48 Doughty Street, Wednesday Evening,” with no date to it, in which he says:

“There is a semi-business, semi-pleasure little dinner which I intend to give at the ‘Prince of Wales,’ in Leicester Place, Leicester Square, on Saturday, at five for half-past precisely, at which Talfourd, Forster, Ainsworth, Jerdan, and the publishers will be present. It is to celebrate (that is too great a word, but I can think of no better) the conclusion of my Pickwick labours; and so I intend, before you take that roll upon the grass you spoke of, to beg your acceptance of one of the first complete copies of the work. I shall be much delighted if you will join us.”

[illustration: The Prince of Wales Hotel, where the Pickwick dinner was held. Drawn by Arch. Webb]

We have seen a similarly worded letter written to Samuel Lover, and no doubt each guest received such an invitation from the novelist.

The only real account of the function is contained in a letter from Ainsworth to his friend, James Crossley, which is as follows:

“On Saturday last we celebrated the completion of The Pickwick Papers. We had a capital dinner, with capital wine and capital speeches. Dickens, of course, was in the chair. Talfourd was the Vice, and an excellent Vice he made. . . . Just before he was about to propose THE toast of the evening the headwaiter — for it was at a tavern that the carouse took place — entered, and placed a glittering temple of confectionery on the table, beneath the canopy of which stood a little figure of the illustrious Mr. Pickwick. This was the work of the landlord. As you may suppose, it was received with great applause. Dickens made a feeling speech in reply to the Serjeant's eulogy. . . . Just before dinner Dickens received a cheque for L750 from his publishers."

Although this hotel cannot rightly be termed a Pickwick inn in the same sense that the others in this book can, it certainly has a claim to honourable mention.

In 1823 the building in which this notable historic dinner took place was known as The Prince of Wales Coffee House and Hotel. When it ceased to be an hotel we are unable to state, but in 1890 it was a French Hospital and Dispensary, ten years later it was let out as offices, and in 1913 it was a foreign club; but the building is practically the same as it was in 1837.

CHAPTER II

THE “GOLDEN CROSS,” CHARING CROSS

Before the “Golden Cross” was given such prominence in The Pickwick Papers, it formed the subject of one of the chapters in Dickens’s previous book, Sketches by Boz. But although there is a “Golden Cross” still standing at Charing Cross to-day, and a fairly old inn to boot, it is not the actual one which figures in these two books and in David Copperfield.

As a matter of fact, there have been several “Golden Crosses” at Charing Cross; one, perhaps the first, stood in the village of Charing in 1643. But the one which claims our attention stood on the exact spot where now towers the Nelson Monument in Trafalgar Square, and was the busiest coaching inn in the west end of London. In front of it was the King Charles statue and the ancient cross of Charing. Close at hand was Northumberland House with its famous lion overlooking the scene.

This “Golden Cross” was either rebuilt in 1811 or in that year had its front altered to the Gothic style. Whichever is the case, it was this Gothic inn that Dickens knew and described in his books. It was demolished in 1827, or thereabouts, to make room for the improvements in the neighbourhood which developed, into the Trafalgar Square we all know to-day. It was then that the present building, facing Charing Cross Station, was erected, which, also in its turn, has had a new frontage.

Dickens in his early youth, whilst employed in a blacking warehouse at Hungerford Stairs and during his youthful wanderings, became intimately acquainted with the district. When, therefore, in the early ‘thirties he commenced his literary career, he recalled those early days and placed on permanent record his impressions of what he then saw, amongst which was the Golden Cross Hotel.

And so we find that in writing the chapter in Sketches by Boz on “Early Coaches” he chooses the “Golden Cross” of his boyhood for its chief incident, an incident which no doubt happened to himself in his early manhood. He had risen early on a certain cold morning to catch the early coach to Birmingham — perhaps to fulfil one of his reporting engagements:

“It strikes 5:15,” he says, “as you trudge down Waterloo Place on your way to the ‘Golden Cross,’ and you discover for the first time that you were called an hour too early. You have no time to go back, and there is no place open to go into, and you have therefore no recourse but to go forward. You arrive at the office. . . . You wander into the booking office. . . . There stands the identical book-keeper in the same position, as if he had not moved since you saw him yesterday. He informs you that the coach is up the yard, and will be brought round in about 15 minutes. . . . You retire to the tap-room. . . . for the purpose of procuring some hot brandy and water, which you do — when the kettle boils, an event which occurs exactly two and a half minutes before the time fixed for the starting of the coach. The first stroke of six peals from St. Martin’s Church steeple as you take the first sip of the boiling liquid. You find yourself in the booking office in two seconds, and the tap waiter finds himself much comforted by your brandy and water in about the same period. . . . The horses are in. . . . The place which a few minutes ago was so still and quiet is all bustle. ‘All right,’ sings the guard. . . . and off we start as briskly as if the morning were all right as well as the coach.”

One of Cruikshank’s pictures illustrates the above scene in the booking office, and in it one of the figures represents Dickens himself as he appeared at the period. Dotted about on the walls are bills in which the name of the hotel is very conspicuous.

In chapter two of The Pickwick Papers we get a further glimpse of the inn, centering in a more exhilarating and epoch-making incident. The Pickwickians were to start on their memorable peregrinations from the “Golden Cross” for Rochester by the famous “Commodore” coach; and Mr. Pickwick having hired a cabriolet in the neighbourhood of his lodgings in Goswell Street arrived at the hotel in order to meet his friends for the purpose. On alighting, and having tendered his fare, an animated incident with the cabman, who accused him of being an informer, ensued, and ended in the assault and battery described in the following words:

“The cabman dashed his hat upon the ground with a reckless disregard of his own private property, and knocked Mr. Pickwick’s spectacles off, and followed up the attack with a blow on Mr. Pickwick’s nose and another on Mr. Pickwick’s chest; and a third in Mr. Snodgrass’s eye; and a fourth, by way of variety, in Mr. Tupman's waistcoat, and then danced into the road and then back again to the pavement, and finally dashed the whole temporary supply of breath out of Mr. Winkle's body; and all in half a dozen seconds."

The embarrassing situation was only saved by the intervention of Mr. Jingle, who quickly settled the cabman and escorted Mr. Pickwick into the travellers' waiting-room and had a raw beefsteak applied to Mr. Pickwick's eye, which had been badly mauled by the irate cabman. All things righted themselves, however, and the merry party left the "Golden Cross" on the coach for their journey to Rochester, to the accompaniment of Mr. Jingle's staccato tones as they drove through the archway, warning the company to take care of their heads:

"“Terrible place — dangerous work — other day — five children — mother- tall lady, eating sandwiches-forgot the arch — crash — knock — children look round — mother's head off — sandwich in her hand — no mouth to put it in — head of family off — shocking — shocking.”“

The "Golden Cross" also figures prominently in David Copperfield on the occasion of the arrival of the hero of the book from Canterbury:

"We went to the 'Golden Cross,'" he says, "then a mouldy sort of establishment in a close neighbourhood. A waiter showed me into the coffee-room, and a chambermaid introduced me to my small bedchamber, which smelt like a hackney coach and was shut up like a family vault."

Later in the evening he met his old school friend, Steerforth, who was evidently on better and more familiar terms with the waiter, for he not only demanded, but secured a better bedroom for David.

[illustration: The Golden Cross Hotel, Charing Cross, in 1828. From an engraving]

"I found my new room a great improvement on my old one," he says, "it not being at all musty and having a fourpost bedstead in it, which was quite a little landed estate. Here, among pillows enough for six, I soon fell asleep in a blissful condition, and dreamed of ancient Rome, Steerforth and friendship, until the early morning coaches rumbling out of the archway underneath made me dream of thunder and the gods."

This comfortable new aspect of the inn did not stop at his bedroom, for he took breakfast the next morning "in a snug private apartment, redcurtained and Turkey carpeted, where the fire burnt bright and a fine hot breakfast was set forth on a table covered with a clean cloth. . . . I could not enough admire the change Steerforth had wrought in the 'Golden Cross'; or compose the dull, forlorn state I had held yesterday with this morning's comfort and this morning's entertainment."

It was on another occasion later in the story that David Copperfield, then lodging in Buckingham Street close by, encountered poor old Peggotty on the steps of St. Martin's Church. It was a snowy, dismal night and Peggotty was resting on his journey in search for Little Emily.

"In those days," says Dickens, "there was a side entrance to the stable yard of the 'Golden Cross' nearly opposite to where we stood. I pointed out the gateway, put my arm through his, and we went across. Two or three public rooms opened out of the stable yard; and looking into one of them, and finding it empty, and a good fire burning, I took him in there."

The side entrance here referred to was at the time in St. Martin's Lane — that part of it which then ran down from St. Martin's Church to the Strand. It led into the stable yard, backing into what is now Trafalgar Square, and was part of the old inn of Pickwick and The Sketches, and not of the present one, which many topographers have asserted.

But the "Golden Cross" had its fame apart from Dickens, although it is Dickens who has immortalized its name for the general public.

As we have pointed out it was the most popular of the West End coaching inns of London. This remark applies to the various houses which have borne its name. It is recorded that as far back as 1757 coaches plied between Brighton, or Brighthelmstone as it was then called, and the "Golden Cross." The fare was 13s. — (children in lap and outside passengers half price). For years afterwards it was the favourite starting-place for the famous Brighton coaches, and in 1821 forty were running to and fro daily.

Coaches from the same inn served Exeter, Salisbury, Blandford, Dorchester and Bridport; Hastings and Tunbridge Wells; Cambridge, Cheltenham, Dover, Norwich and Portsmouth. It was from here that the historic "Comet" and "Regent" to Brighton and the "Tally Ho" for Birmingham set out on their journeys, and although the "Golden Cross" which stands to-day cannot boast the glory of the old days of the coaching era, it is still a busy centre, situated as it is in the very heart of London opposite one of its busiest railway termini.

To-day new Dickensian associations circle round it, for on certain days during the summer months motor coaches, chartered by the Dickens Fellowship, make this the starting point for their pilgrimages into Dickensland, often taking the route the Pickwickians did, as recorded in their chronicles.

CHAPTER III

THE “BULL,” ROCHESTER, “WRIGHT’S NEXT HOUSE” AND THE “BLUE LION,” MUGGLETON

To the accompaniment of the “stranger’s” breathless eloquence, the Pickwickians’ first journey from London passed with no untoward adventure. Although the “Commodore” coach stopped occasionally to change horses and incidentally to refresh the passengers, no mention of an inn by name or any other designation is made, however, until The Bull Inn in the High Street, Rochester, is reached.

“Here — not I — but you’d better — good house — nice beds — Wright’s next house, dear — very dear — half a crown in the bill if you look at the waiter — charge you more if you dine at a friend’s than they would if you dined in the coffee room — rum fellows — very.”

After consultation with his friends Mr. Pickwick invited the “stranger” to dine with them, which he accepted with alacrity.

“Great pleasure — not presume to dictate, but boiled fowl and mushrooms — capital thing! What time?”

The hour being arranged they parted for the time being.

Dickens knew his Rochester well, even in the days when he was writing Pickwick — a knowledge gained doubtless when a lad at Chatham, and Jingle’s reference to “Wright’s next house” is evidence of this, for there was such an hotel at the time, the owner’s name of which was Wright. It was a few doors away, but was actually the next public-house, which, of course, was what was meant.

Its original name was the “Crown,” but in 1836 the said Wright, on becoming proprietor, altered the name it then bore to that of his own. He also changed its appearance to suit his own fancies. In the earlier days it was a typical coaching inn, and had the reputation of once having been favoured with a visit of Queen Elizabeth, as well of Hogarth and his friends. It claimed to have been built in 1390, and was then owned by Simon Potyn, who was several times member of Parliament for the city.

In an old engraving of Rochester Bridge the inn can be seen with the word “Wright’s” distinctly showing in prominent letters emblazoned on its frontage, if such proof that Jingle was not romancing were necessary.

The inn was rebuilt in 1864, and has been identified as the “Crozier” of Edwin Drood, where Datchery, on his first arrival in the town “announced himself . . . as an idle dog living on his means . . . as he stood with his back to the empty fire-place, waiting for his fried sole, veal cutlet and pint of sherry.”

In the meantime Mr. Pickwick and his friends, after having engaged and inspected a private sitting-room and bedrooms and ordered their dinner at “The Bull,” set out to inspect the city and adjoining neighbourhood.

Before the days of Pickwick, the “Bull” presumably was merely a comfortable roadside coaching inn between Dover and London, with no claim to fame other than that of being a favoured resort of the military from the adjacent town of Chatham. It is true that Queen Victoria — then but a Princess — was compelled, because of a mishap to the bridge across the Medway and the stormy weather, to stay in the inn with her mother, the Duchess of Kent, for one night only. They were on their way to London from Dover. The event happened on the 29th of November, 1836, and caused a flutter of excitement in the city and inspired the proprietor to add the words “Royal Victoria” to the inn’s name, and to justify the adornment of the front of the building with the royal crest of arms.

But it remained for the Pickwickians to draw the inn out from the ruck of the commonplace, and to spread its fame to all corners of the globe; and the fact that it once had royal patronage is nothing in comparison to the other fact that it was the headquarters of the Pickwickians on a certain memorable occasion. That is the attraction to it; that is the immutable thing that makes its name a household word wherever the English language is spoken. Indeed, that was the one notable event in its history which filled the proprietor with pride, and in his wisdom, in order to lure visitors into its comfortable interior, he could find no more magnetic announcement for the signboard on each side of the entrance than the plain unvarnished statement: “Good House. Nice Beds. Vide Pickwick.”

It may have boasted a history before then: it is difficult to say. It existed in 1827 when Dickens housed the famous four within its hospitable walls; and he doubtless knew it long before then when, as a lad, he lived in Chatham; anyway, it was always a favourite of his, and furnishes the scene of many incidents in his books, in addition to the part it plays in the early portion of The Pickwick Papers; it no doubt is the original of the “Winglebury Arms” in “The Great Winglebury Duel” in Sketches by Boz, and is certainly the “Blue Boar” of Great Expectations.

Dickens frequented it himself, and the room he occupied on those occasions is known as the Dickens room and is furnished with pieces of furniture from his residence at Gad’s Hill. We know, too, that he conducted his friends over it, on those occasions when he made pilgrimages with them around the neighbourhood.

The house has been slightly altered since those days, but it practically remains the same as when Dickens deposited the Pickwickians in its courtyard that red-letter day in 1827. Its outside is dull and sombre-looking, but its interior comfort and spaciousness soon dispel any misgivings which its exterior might have created.

The entrance hall is as spacious as it was when Dickens described it, in “The Great Winglebury Duel,” as ornamented with evergreen plants terminating in a perspective view of the bar, and a glass case, in which were displayed a choice variety of delicacies ready for dressing, to catch the eye of a new-comer the moment he enters, and excite his appetite to the highest possible pitch. “Opposite doors,” he says, “lead to the ‘coffee’ and ‘commercial’ rooms; and a great wide rambling staircase — three stairs and a landing — four stairs and another landing — one step and another landing — and so on — conducts to galleries of bedrooms and labyrinths of sitting-rooms, denominated ‘private,’ where you may enjoy yourself as privately as you can in any place where some bewildered being or other walks into your room every five minutes by mistake, and then walks out again, to open all the doors along the gallery till he finds his own.”

And so the visitor finds it to-day, although the interior of the coffee-room may have been denuded of its compartments which the interview between Pip and Bentley Drummle in Great Expectations suggests were there on that occasion. It was in this room that the Pickwickians breakfasted and awaited the arrival of the chaise to take them to Dingley Dell; and it was over its blinds that Mr. Pickwick surveyed the passers-by in the street, and before which the vehicle made its appearance with the very amusing result known to all readers of the book.

The commercial room is across the yard, over which on one occasion Mr. Wopsle was reciting Collin's ode to Pip in Great Expectations with such dramatic effect that the commercials objected and sent up their compliments with the remark that "it wasn't the Tumbler's Arms."

From the hall runs the staircase upon which took place the famous scene between Dr. Slammer and Jingle, illustrated so spiritedly by Phiz. Those who remember the incident — and who does not? — can visualize it all again as they mount the stairs to the bedrooms above, which the Pickwickians occupied. They remain as Dickens described them, even in some cases to the very bedsteads and furniture, and are still shown to the interested visitor.

"Winkle's bedroom is inside mine," is how Mr. Tupman put it. That is to say, the one led out of the other, and they are numbered 13 and 19; but which is which no one knows. Number 18, by the way, is the room the Queen slept in on the occasion of her visit, eight months after the appearance of the first part of Pickwick.

Number 17 is claimed as Mr. Pickwick's room, which is also the one Dickens occupied on one occasion, and the one spoken of in Seven Poor Travellers, from which the occupant assured us that after the cathedral bell struck eight he "could smell the delicious savour of turkey and roast beef rising to the window of my adjoining room, which looked down into the yard just where the lights of the kitchen reddened a massive fragment of the castle wall"

An important feature in those days, and presumably to-day, was the ballroom, "the elegant and commodious assembly rooms to the Winglebury Arms." In The Pickwick Papers Dickens thus describes it: "It was a long room, with crimson-covered benches, and wax candles in glass chandeliers. The musicians were securely confined in an elevated den, and quadrilles were being systematically got through by two or three sets of dancers. Two card tables were made up in the adjoining card-room, and two pair of old ladies and a corresponding number of stout gentlemen were executing whist therein."

The room itself is little altered; although the glass chandeliers have been removed, there still remains at the end the veritable elevated den where the fiddlers fiddled. During the war it was turned into a dining-room on account of the military and naval demands of the town; but there may come a time when it will revert to its old glory and tradition.

On the evening of the Pickwickians' arrival Jingle remarks that there is a "Devil of a mess on the staircase, waiter. Forms going up — carpenters coming down — lamps, glasses, harps. What's going forward?"

"Ball, sir," said the waiter.

"Assembly, eh?"

"No, sir, not assembly, sir. Ball for the benefit of charity, sir."

This was the famous ball at which the incident occurred resulting in the challenge to a duel between Dr. Slammer and Winkle, the details of which require no reiteration here.

But the pleasant fact remains that the Bull Inn exists to-day and the Dickens tradition clings to it still. One instinctively goes there as the centre of the Dickensian atmosphere with which the old city of Rochester is permeated.

The Bull Inn should never lose its fame. Indeed, as long as it lasts it never will, because Pickwick can never be forgotten. The present-day traveller will go by rail, or some day by an aerial 'bus, and may forget the old days during his journey; but when he arrives there and walks into the inn yard, whole visions of the coaching days will come back to him, and prominent amongst them will be the arrival of the "Commodore" coach with the Pickwickians on board, and the departure of the chaise with the same company with Winkle struggling with the tall mare, on their way to Dingley Dell, which resulted so disastrously. He might be curious enough to want to discover the "little roadside public-house with two elm trees, horse-trough and a sign-post in front," where the travellers attempted to put up the horse. That, however, has not been discovered, although Dickens no doubt had a particular one in his mind at the time.

During their stay at Manor Farm, Dingley Dell, the Pickwickians visited Muggleton to witness the cricket match between Dingley Dell and all Muggleton. "Everybody whose genius has a topographical bent," says Dickens, "knows perfectly well that Muggleton is a corporate town, with a mayor, burgesses and freeman," but so far no topographer has discovered which corporate town it was. Some say Maidstone, others Town Malling. Until that vexed question has been settled, however, the identification of the "large inn with a sign-post in front, displaying an object very common in art, but very rarely met with in nature — to wit, a Blue Lion with three legs in the air, balancing himself on the extreme point of the centre claw of his fourth foot,” cannot definitely be verified. The same remark applies to the Crown Inn, where Jingle stopped on the same occasion.

[illustration: The Swan Inn, Town Malling. Drawn by C. G. Harper]

At Maidstone there is a “White Lion,” and at Town Malling there is the “Swan.” Which of these is the original of the inn where Mr. Wardle hired a chaise and four to pursue Jingle and Miss Rachael, and on whose steps, the following Christmas, the Pickwickians, on their second visit to Dingley Dell, were deposited “high and dry, safe and sound, hale and hearty,” by the Muggleton Telegraph, when they discovered the Fat Boy just aroused from a sleep in front of the tap-room fire, must be left to the choice of the reader.

CHAPTER IV

THE “WHITE HART,” BOROUGH

The pursuit of Jingle and Miss Wardle by the lady's father and Mr. Pickwick, culminates in the “White Hart,” which, in days gone by, was one of the most famous of the many famous inns that then stood in the borough of Southwark. Long before Dickens began to write, the “White Hart” was the centre of the coaching activity of the metropolis south of the Thames, and was one of the oldest inns in the country.

Travellers from the Continent and the southern and eastern counties of England to London made it their halting-place, whilst from a business standpoint it had scarcely a rival. Coaches laden with passengers and wagons full of articles of commerce made the courtyard of the inn always a bustling and busy corner of a hustling and busy neighbourhood. In the coaching era, therefore, the “White Hart” was a household word to travellers and business men. Dickens, with his magic pen and inventive genius, made it a household word to the inhabitants of the whole globe, who never had occasion to visit it either for business or pleasure.

Its history goes back many centuries: as far back as 1400, and possibly earlier than that. Its sign was taken from the badge of Richard II, who adopted the emblem of the “White Hart” from the crest of his mother, Joanna of Kent. A fine old inn of the highest type, the “White Hart” no doubt was the resort of the most prominent nobles and retainers of the time, public men of the period and ambassadors of commerce. It is not surprising, therefore, that it figures in English history generally, and was particularly mentioned by Shakespeare. It certainly was the centre of many a stirring scene, and events of feasting and jollity, besides being a place where great trade was transacted.

It is often mentioned in the Paston Letters in reference to Jack Cade, who made it his headquarters in 1450. In Hall's Chronicles it is recorded that the Captain, being made aware of the King's absence, came first to Southwark, and there lodged at the “White Hart.” In Henry VI, Part II, Jack Cade is made to say, "Hath my sword therefore broke through London gates, that you should leave me at the 'White Hart' in Southwark?"

Thomas Cromwell, Henry VIII's most able minister, was also associated with the borough of Southwark, and on one occasion (in 1529) it is recorded that he received a message to the effect that one R. awaited him at the "White Hart" on important business. Again the inn has mention in connection with the rebellion brought about by Archbishop Laud's attitude to the Scottish and Puritan Churches, when we are told that the populace and soldiers associated with it lodged at the "White Hart." And in a like manner mention might be made of other occasions during which, in those far-off days, the "White Hart" played some notable part in history and in the social round of the period.

In 1676 it was entirely destroyed by the great fire of Southwark, but was rebuilt immediately afterward on the old site and on the old model. It was described by Strype about this time as a very large inn, and we believe that it was able to accommodate between one and two hundred guests and their retinue, with ample rooms left for their belongings, horses and goods. It did a considerable trade and was esteemed one of the best inns in Southwark, and so it continued as a favourite place of resort for coaches and carriers until the end of the coaching days.

When, therefore, Mr. Pickwick set all the world agog with his adventures, the "White Hart" was recognized as a typical old English inn, and was really at its best. It had arrived at this prosperous state by easy stages during its previous 180 years, and had a reputation for comfort and generous hospitality during the best days of the coaching era, which had reached the golden age when Mr. Pickwick discovered Sam Weller cleaning boots in its coach yard one historic morning in the early nineteenth century.

It is not to be wondered at, then, that Dickens, who knew this district so well and intimately, should introduce the "White Hart" into his book as a setting for one of his most amusing scenes. After speaking of London's inns in general, he makes special mention of those in the Borough, where, he says, there still remained some half-dozen old inns, "which have preserved their external features unchanged, and which have escaped alike the rage for public improvement and the encroachments of private speculation." Since these words were written public improvement has "improved" all of them, except one, the "George," right out of existence.

But let us use Dickens's own words to describe these inns in general and the "White Hart" in particular, for none of ours can improve his picture.

"Great, rambling, queer old places they are, with galleries and passages and staircases, wide enough and antiquated enough to furnish materials for a hundred ghost stories, supposing we should ever be reduced to the lamentable necessity of inventing any, and that the world should exist long enough to exhaust the innumerable veracious legends connected with old London Bridge and its adjacent neighbourhood on the Surrey side.

"It was in the yard of one of these inns — of no less celebrated a one than the 'White Hart' — that a man was busily employed in brushing the dirt off a pair of boots, early on the morning succeeding the events narrated in the last chapter. He was habited in a coarse-striped waistcoat, with black calico sleeves, and blue glass buttons, drab breeches and leggings. A bright red handkerchief was wound in a very loose and unstudied style round his neck, and an old white hat was carelessly thrown on one side of his head. There were two rows of boots before him, one cleaned and the other dirty, and at every addition he made to the clean row, he paused from his work, and contemplated its results with evident satisfaction."

This, we need hardly say, was the inimitable Sam Weller, and it was his first introduction to the story with which his name is now inseparable.

[illustration: The White Hart Inn, Southwark, in 1858. From an engraving by Fairholt, after a drawing by J. Sachs]

Dickens then goes on to give further particulars of how the yard looked on the particular morning of which he writes:

"The yard presented none of that bustle and activity which are the usual characteristics of a large coach inn. Three or four lumbering wagons, each with a pile of goods beneath its ample canopy, about the height of the second-floor window of an ordinary house, were stowed away beneath a lofty roof which extended over one end of the yard; and another, which was probably to commence its journey that morning, was drawn out into the open space. A double tier of bedroom galleries, with old, clumsy balustrades, ran round two sides of the straggling area, and a double row of bells to correspond, sheltered from the weather by a little sloping roof, hung over the door. . . . Two or three gigs and chaise-carts were wheeled up under different little sheds and penthouses; and the occasional heavy tread of a carhorse or rattling of a chain at the further end of the yard announced to anybody who cared about the matter that the stable lay in that direction.

When we add that a few boys in smock frocks were lying asleep on heavy packages, wool-packs and other articles that were scattered about on heaps of straw, we have described as fully as need be the general appearance of the yard of the White Hart Inn, High Street, Borough, on the particular morning in question.”

This was the inn, then, to which Mr. Pickwick and Mr. Wardle came in search of the runaway couple, and Sam Weller was the first person they interviewed on the subject. The reader will refer to Chapter X of the book should he want his memory refreshed regarding the amusing scene with Sam, which has been so faithfully pictured by Phiz in one of his illustrations. How they discovered the misguided Rachael, how they bought off the adventurer, Jingle, and how Mr. Pickwick, Wardle and the deserted lady set forth the next day by the Muggleton heavy coach is duly set forth in Dickens’s own way.

The “White Hart” remained very much as Dickens found it and described it in 1836 until it was finally demolished in 1889. Following the advent of railways it lost a good deal of its glamour, and in its last years the old galleries on two of its sides were let out in tenements, and the presence of the occupants gave a certain animation to the scene. In the large inner yard were some quaint old house which were crowded with lodgers, but it still hung on to its old traditions of the coaching times, and even up to its last days the old inn was the halting-place of the last of the old-fashioned omnibuses which plied between London Bridge and Clapham.

Nothing now remains to remind us of the old inn which Dickens and Sam Weller have made immortal in the annals of coaching but a narrow turning bearing its name, where is established a Sam Weller Club.

CHAPTER V

“LA BELLE SAUVAGE” AND THE “MARQUIS OF GRANBY,” DORKING

“La Belle Sauvage” has, like many other historic inns, gone into the limbo of past, if not of forgotten, things, leaving nothing but its name denoting a cul-de-sac, to remind the present generation of its one-time fame.

This was the inn where Tony Weller, resplendent in many layers of cloth cape and huge brimmed hat, stopped “wen he drove up” on the box seat of one of the stage coaches of the period. For Tony was, as everybody knows, a coachman typical of the period of the book, and the “Belle Savage” (the spelling of “savage” here follows the fashion of the period referred to) was where he started and ended his journeys in London. But the anecdote related by his son of how he was hoodwinked into taking out a licence to marry Mrs. Clarke contains the chief of the only two actual references to the fact that his head-quarters were the “Belle Savage,” as he called it. It is certainly recorded that he started from the “Bull” in Whitechapel when he drove the Pickwickians to Ipswich, but it is the “Belle Savage” that is associated with his name.

“‘Tony Weller,’ says my father. ‘Parish?’ says the lawyer. ‘Belle Savage,’ says my father; for he stopped there wen he drove up, and he know’d nothing about parishes, he didn’t.”

Now it seems to us a curious fact that Dickens never made any further use of this famous inn, either in Pickwick or in his other books; indeed, we can only recall one other reference to it, and that when Sam’s father rather despondently told him that “a thousand things may have happened by the time you next hears any news of the celebrated Mr. Veller o’ the ‘Bell Savage:’” It is particularly curious in regard to Pickwick, for the inn was not only close to the Fleet Prison, which figures so prominently in the book, but its outbuildings actually adjoined it. Meagre as is the reference, it is, nevertheless, retained in the memory, and the inn proclaimed a Pickwickian one with as much satisfaction as if it had been the scene of many an incident such as connect others with the book.

Unfortunately there are only one or two landmarks remaining to show that it ever existed. One of these is the archway out of Ludgate Hill, just beyond the hideous bridge which runs across the road, at the side of No. 68, which in Pickwickian days was No. 38. Perhaps the shape of the yard which still bears the inn's name may be considered as a trace of its former glory. This yard is now surrounded by the business premises of Messrs. Cassell and Co., the well-known publishers, which occupy the whole site of the old building.

We can find no earlier reference to the inn than that in the reign of Henry VI, when a certain John French in a deed (1453) made over to his mother for her life "all that tenement or inn, with its appurtenances, called Savage's Inn, otherwise called 'le Bell on the Hope' in the parish of Fleet Street, London." Prior to that it may be surmised that it belonged to a citizen of the name of Savage, probably the "William Savage of Fleet Street in the Parish of St. Bridget," upon whom, it is recorded in 1380, an attempt was made "to obtain by means of forged letter, twenty shillings."

It would be clear from this that its sign was the "Bell and Hoop," before it became the property of the Savage family, from whom there can be no doubt it got its name of "La Belle Savage." According to Stow, Mrs. Isabella Savage gave the inn to the Cutlers' Company, but this would seem to be incorrect, for more recent research has proved definitely that it was a John Craythorne who did so in 1568. The crest of the Cutlers' Company is the Elephant and Castle, and a stone bas-relief of it, which once stood over the gateway of the inn under the sign of the Bell, is still to be seen on the east wall of La Belle Savage Yard to-day. It was placed there some fifty years ago when the old inn was demolished.

[illustration: La Belle Sauvage Inn, Ludgate Hill. From a drawing by T. Hosmer Shepherd]

Years before Craythorne presented the inn to the Cutlers' Company, however, it was known as "La Belle Sauvage," for we are told that Sir Thomas Wyatt, the warrior poet, in 1554 made his last stand with his Kentish men against the troops of Mary just in front of the ancient inn, "La Belle Sauvage." He was attempting to capture Ludgate and was driven back with some thousands of rebel followers to Temple Bar, where he surrendered himself to Sir Maurice Berkeley, and so sealed his own fate and that of poor Lady Jane Grey.

Again, in 1584, the inn was described as “Ye Belle Sauvage,” and there have been many speculations as to the origin of the name, and some doubt as to the correct spelling.

In 1648 and 1672 exhibitions of landlords’ tokens of various inns were held, whereat were shown two belonging to “La Belle Sauvage,” the sign of one being that of an Indian woman holding a bow and arrow, and the other, of Queen Anne’s time, that of a savage standing by a bell, and it has been conjectured that this latter sign may have suggested the name. But as the inn was known as “Ye Belle Savage” some sixty years previously this is hardly likely. Another conjecture as to its origin was made by Addison in The Spectator, who, having read an old French romance which gives an account of a beautiful woman called in French “La Belle Sauvage” and translated into English as “Bell Savage,” considered the name was derived from that source. Alderman Sir W. P. Treloar, in his excellent little book on “Ludgate Hill,” puts forth another idea. “As the inn,” he says, “was the mansion of the Savage family, and near to Bailey or Ballium, it is at least conceivable that it would come to be known as the Bail or Bailey Savage Inn, and afterward the Old Bail or Bailey Inn.” We prefer, however, to favour the Isabella Savage theory as the likely one.

Long before Elizabeth’s time and long after-wards the inn was a very famous one. In the days before Shakespeare the actors gave performances of their plays in the old inn yard, using the courtyards as the pit in theatres is used to-day, and the upper and lower galleries for what are now the boxes and galleries of modern theatres. In 1556, the old inns, such as the “Cross Keys,” the “Bull” and “Belle Sauvage” were used extensively for this purpose, the latter, we are told, almost ranking as a permanent theatre. We find Collier also stating that the “Belle Sauvage” was a favourite place for these performances.

Originally the old inn consisted of two courts, an inner and outer one. The present archway from Ludgate Hill led into the latter, which at one time contained private houses. A distinguished resident in one of these (No. 11) was Grinling Gibbons. According to Horace Walpole, Gibbons carved an exquisite pot of flowers in wood, which stood on his window-sill there, and shook surprisingly with the motion of the coaches that passed beneath. The inn proper, surrounded by its picturesque galleries, stood in a corner of the inner court, entered by a second archway about half-way up the yard.

Part of the inn abutted on to the back of Fleet Prison, and Mr. Tearle in his Rambles with an American, bearing this fact in mind, ingeniously suggests that the conception of the idea for smuggling Mr. Pickwick from the prison by means of a piano without works may have been conceived in Mr. Weller's brain while resting in the "Belle Sauvage" and contemplating the prison wall.

In 1828, the period of The Pickwick Papers, J. Pollard painted a picture of the Cambridge coach ("The Star") leaving the inn. A portion of this picture showing the coach and the north side of Ludgate Hill, was published as a lithograph by Thomas McLean of the Haymarket. It gives the details of the inn entrance and the coach on a large scale. The inn at the time was owned by Robert Nelson. He was a son of Mrs. Ann Nelson, the popular proprietor of the "Bull," Whitechapel. Besides the coaches for the eastern counties, those also for other parts of the country started from its precincts, for such names as Bath, Bristol, Exeter, Plymouth, Oxford, Gloucester, Coventry, Carlisle, Manchester were announced on the signboard at the side of the archway.

In spite of the fact that Dickens only once refers to the inn, its name and fame, nevertheless, will always be associated with him and with Tony Weller, who was so familiar with it and so attached to it, as to name it as the parish he resided in.

The relating of the story of how Tony Weller was driven into his second marriage, which reveals "La Belle Sauvage" as his headquarters, also first brings into prominence the "Markis o' Granby," Dorking, as the residence of Mrs. Susan Clarke, and incidentally the scene of more than one amusing incident after she became Mrs. Weller, senior. "The 'Marquis of Granby' in Mrs. Weller's time," we are informed, "was quite a model of a roadside public-house of the better class — just large enough to be convenient, and small enough to be snug."

In the chapter describing how Sam displayed his high sense of duty as a son, by paying a visit to his "mother-in-law," as he called her, and how he discovered Mr. Stiggins indulging in “hot pine-apple rum and water,” we get a little pen-picture of the inn.

Phiz’s picture, forming the vignette on the title-page, hardly does justice to this description, although the incident of old Weller performing the “beautiful and exhilarating” act of immersing Mr. Stiggins’s head in the horse-trough full of water, is spirited enough.

The “Markis Gran by Dorken,” as the elder Weller styled it in his letter to Sam, is another of those inns, which figure prominently in the book, that have never been actually identified. Robert Allbut, in 1897, claimed to have found the original in the High Street opposite the Post Office at the side of Chequers’ Court. Only a part of it then existed, and was being used as a grocer’s shop.

Herbert Railton gave an artistic picture of the courtyard in the Jubilee edition of the book, but we are not able to state on what authority it was based.

There were, however, two inns at Dorking, the “King’s Head” and the “King’s Arms,” over which speculation has been rife as to which was the original of the inn so favoured by the Revd. Mr. Stiggins. Of the two, perhaps, the latter, still existing, seems to fit Dickens’s description best.

CHAPTER VI

THE “LEATHER BOTTLE,” COBHAM, KENT

The charming Kentish village of Cobham was familiar to Dickens in his early boyhood days, as was the whole delightful countryside surrounding it. That he loved it throughout his whole life there is ample evidence in his letters. It was inevitable, therefore, that his enthusiasm for it should find vent in his stories, and the first references to its green woods and green shady lanes are to be found in charming phrases in The Pickwick Papers, with the “Leather Bottle” as the centre of attraction.

The inn is first named in the book in Mr. Tupman’s pathetic letter to Mr. Pickwick written on a certain historic morning at Dingley Dell:

“MY DEAR PICKWICK, “You, my dear friend, are placed far beyond the reach of many mortal frailties and weaknesses which ordinary people cannot over come. You do not know what it is, at one blow, to be deserted by a lovely and fascinating creature, and to fall a victim to the artifices of a villain, who hid the grin of cunning beneath the mask of friendship. I hope you never may. “Any letter, addressed to me at the ‘Leather Bottle,’ Cobham, Kent, will be forwarded — supposing I still exist. I hasten from the sight of the world, which has become odious to me. Should I hasten from it altogether, pity — forgive me. Life, my dear Pickwick, has become insupportable to me. The spirit which burns within us, is a porter’s knot, on which to rest the heavy load of worldly cares and troubles; and when that spirit fails us, the burden is too heavy to be borne. We sink beneath it. You may tell Rachel — Ah, that name! “TRACY TUPMAN.”

[illustration: The “Leather Bottle,” Cobham, Kent. From a photograph]

No sooner had Mr. Pickwick read this plaintive missive than he decided to follow, with his two other companions, Winkle and Snodgrass, in search of their depressed friend. On the coach journey to Rochester “the violence of their grief had sufficiently abated to admit of their making a very excellent early dinner,” and having discovered the right road all three set forward again in the after-noon to walk to Cobham.

“A delightful walk it was; for it was a pleasant afternoon in June, and their way lay through a deep and shady wood, cooled by the light wind which gently rustled the thick foliage, and enlivened by the songs of the birds that perched upon the boughs. The ivy and the moss crept in thick clusters over the old trees, and the soft green turf overspread the ground like a silken mat. They emerged upon an open park, with an ancient hall, displaying the quaint and picturesque architecture of Elizabeth’s time. Long vistas of stately oaks and elm trees appeared on every side; large herds of deer were cropping the fresh grass; and occasionally a startled hare scoured along the ground, with the speed of the shadows thrown by the light clouds which sweep across a sunny landscape like a passing breath of summer.”

Dickens wrote that charming descriptive passage in 1836, probably whilst spending his honeymoon at Chalk near by, and anyone taking the same walk will find that the words paint the scene perfectly and faithfully to-day, so unspoiled and unaltered is it. The spot will delight the traveler as much as it did Mr. Pickwick, who exclaimed, as it all came in view: “If this were the place to which all who are troubled with our friend’s complaint came, I fancy their old attachment to this world would very soon return”; at any rate, his other companions were all agreed upon the point. “And really,” added Mr. Pickwick, after half an hour’s walking had brought them to the village, “really for a misanthrope’s choice, this is one of the prettiest and most desirable places of residence I ever met with.”

Having been directed to the “Leather Bottle,” “a clean and commodious village ale-house,” the three travellers entered, and at once inquired for a gentleman of the name of Tupman. In those days the inn was managed by a landlady, who promptly told Tom to “show the gentlemen into the parlour.”

“On the entrance of his friends, that gentleman laid down his knife and fork, and with a mournful air advanced to meet them.”

Mr. Tupman was quite affected by his friends' anxiety for his welfare, but any demonstration was nipped in the bud by Mr. Pickwick's insisting on Mr. Tupman finishing his delicate repast first. At the conclusion thereof, Mr. Pickwick, "having refreshed himself with a copious draft of ale," conducted poor Tracy to the churchyard opposite, and pacing to and fro eventually combated his companion's resolution with a successfully eloquent appeal to him once again to join his friends.

On their way back to the inn, Mr. Pickwick made that great discovery "which had been the pride and boast of his friends, and the envy of every antiquarian in this or any other country," of a small broken stone, partially buried in the ground in front of a cottage door, which, as everybody knows, bore the inscription:

B I L S T
U M
P S H I
S.M.
A R K

The exultation and joy of the Pickwickians knew no bounds and they carefully carried the important stone into the inn, where Mr. Pickwick's eyes sparkled with a delight as he sat and gloated over the treasure he had discovered, the detailed adventure with which need not be related here. Having carefully packed his prize, its discovery and the happy meeting were duly celebrated in an evening of festivity and conversation.

"It was past 11 o'clock — a late hour for the little village of Cobham — when Mr. Pickwick retired to the bedroom which had been prepared for his reception. He threw open the lattice-window, and, setting his light upon the table, fell into a train of meditation on the hurried events of the two preceding days.

"The hour and the place were both favourable to contemplation; Mr. Pickwick was roused by the church clock striking twelve. The first stroke of the hour sounded solemnly in his ear, but when the bell ceased the stillness seemed insupportable; he almost felt as if he had lost a companion. He was nervous and excited; and hastily undressing himself, and placing his light in the chimney, got into bed."

But Mr. Pickwick could not sleep following the excitement of the day's adventure, so "after half an hour's tumbling about, he came to the unsatisfactory conclusion that it was of no use trying to sleep, so he got up and partially dressed himself. Anything, he thought, was better than lying there fancying all kinds of horrors. He looked out of the window — it was very dark. He walked about the room — it was very lonely.”

Suddenly he thought of The Madman’s Manuscript which he had brought from Dingley Dell, and, trimming his light, he put on his spectacles and composed himself to read that blood-curdling narrative. On reaching the end, Mr. Pickwick’s candle “went suddenly out” and he once more scrambled into bed.

Next morning, with the coveted antiquarian treasure, the four gentlemen travelled to London by coach.

That is the story of the association of the “Leather Bottle,” Cobham, with The Pickwick Papers, which has spread its fame to the uttermost parts of the world. That is the chief reason why in certain seasons of the year the “Leather Bottle” and Cobham are visited by thousands of admirers of the novelist, and also why the ideal Kentish village has become a magnet to lovers of England’s rural lanes and arable fields; but the charm of it all is that when it is reached both it and the inn are to be found exactly as Dickens so faithfully described them many years ago.

The inn is just an inn; a commodious village ale-house; that is the best description of it. Its picturesque exterior, with its hanging sign bearing a portrait of Mr. Pickwick in the act of addressing the club, and the legend, “Dickens’s Old Pickwick Leather Bottle,” and its red-tiled roof, its small windows with their old-fashioned shutters, is no less quaint and attractive than its old-time interior. Its original sign — the Leather Bottle — hangs in the tiny bar which is on the immediate right of the passage, and behind a glass window, looking as unlike a bar as anything imaginable. From this curious little receptacle refreshment for travellers and villagers is dispensed in stone mugs embellished with the sign of the inn; and its “low-roofed room” is at the end of the passage as Mr. Pickwick found it, with its oak beams across the ceiling adding to its picturesqueness. In this room the “high back leather-cushioned chairs” are still to be seen, together with a grandfather clock and other antique pieces of furniture in thorough keeping with tradition.

There, too, is the great “variety of old portraits” which decorated the wall in Mr. Pickwick’s time, with every other available inch of wall space now covered with portraits of the novelist and his memorable characters, pictures of scenes from his books, Dickensian relics and knickknacks, either associated with the book which brought it fame or with other books of the famous Boz. In a word, it is a veritable Dickens museum, in which every lover of the novelist lingers with pleasure and amazement, oblivious of the fact that possibly his tea is getting cold.

Here the visitor can have his meal as did Mr. Tupman, not perhaps in such solitude, for the “Leather Bottle” to-day is often a busy centre for pedestrians from the neighbouring villages, and cyclists and motorists from far-distant towns and cities.

Upstairs, overlooking the churchyard, is the identical front bedroom where Mr. Pickwick spent the night, and where he sat reading long into the early and eerie hours of the morning. The present landlord is a true Dickensian in knowledge and character, and endeavours to make everybody comfortable and welcome, no matter who he be. A glance at the visitors’ book will show how the inn has been sought out by every grade of society from all over the world. Indeed, we doubt if Shakespeare’s birthplace can surpass this inn in popularity.

But it is not merely a Pickwickian inn. It is a Dickensian inn for which the novelist himself had a warm place in his heart for its own sake, spending many pleasant hours within its comfortable walls. Long before he came to live at Gad’s Hill, close by, he loved the place. As a boy at Chatham, probably he walked over in company with his father; and when spending his honeymoon at Chalk, he no doubt roamed in the beautiful lanes around the village. In 1840, after spending a vacation at Broadstairs, he posted back to London with Maclise and Forster by way of Chatham, Rochester and Cobham, and the three spent two agreeable days in revisiting well-remembered scenes.

Again in 1841 Dickens and Forster passed a day and night in Cobham and its neighbourhood, sleeping at the “Leather Bottle,” and when he ultimately became a resident at Gad’s Hill the whole district was the greatest pleasure to him. His biographer, writing of the year 1856, says: “Round Cobham, skirting the park and village and passing the ‘Leather Bottle,’ famous in the pages of Pickwick, was a favourite walk with Dickens.”

He would often take his friends and visitors with him on these walks, and would never miss the old village inn. W. P. Frith has told us of how, when he formed one of the party on one of these occasions, “we went to the ‘Leather Bottle,’” and, no doubt, the company was merry and reminiscent on the association of the village with the novelist and his immortal book.

The happy thing to be remembered to-day is that neither the village, park, nor inn have changed since those historic days, so that little imagination is required by the pilgrim to recall to his mind the scenes and characters which have made them familiar to lovers of Dickens in every English-speaking country.

CHAPTER VII

THE “TOWN ARMS,” EATANSWILL, AND THE INN OF “THE BAGMAN’S STORY”

Following the Pickwickians in the sequence of their peregrinations, we become confronted with the problem, “which was the prototype of Eatanswill?” Having weighed the evidence of each of the other claimants for the honour, we favour that of Sudbury in Suffolk, for which so good a case has been presented. That being so, the “Rose and Crown” undoubtedly would be the original of the “Town Arms,” the headquarters of the Blues and the inn at which Mr. Pickwick and his friends alighted on their arrival in the town.

First let us briefly state the case for Sudbury.

In the opening paragraph of Chapter XIII of the book, Dickens writes:

“We will frankly acknowledge, that up to the period of our being first immersed in the voluminous papers of the Pickwick Club, we had never heard of Eatanswill; we will with equal candour admit, that we have in vain searched for proof of the actual existence of such a place at the present day. . . . We are therefore led to believe, that Mr. Pickwick, with that anxious desire to abstain from giving offence to any, and with those delicate feelings for which all who knew him well know he was so eminently remarkable, purposely substituted a fictitious designation, for the real name of the place in which his observations were made. We are confirmed in this belief by a little circumstance, apparently slight and trivial in itself, but when considered from this point of view, not undeserving of notice. In Mr. Pickwick’s notebook, we can just trace an entry of the fact, that the places of himself and followers were booked by the Norwich coach; but this entry was afterwards lined through, as if for the purpose of concealing even the direction in which the borough is situated.”

That description fits Sudbury admirably and faithfully, but does not by any means fit either Ipswich or Norwich, the two other claimants, and the evidence of Mr. C. Finden Waters, a one-time proprietor of the “Rose and Crown” at Sudbury, makes it almost certain that Sudbury was the place Dickens had in mind.

Mr. Waters, in 1906, devoted much time and research in order to establish his claim, and in March, 1907, read a paper, setting forth in detail the various points which led him to that conclusion, to the members of a then newly formed coterie who called themselves “The Eatanswill Club.” It appears that this evidence established the fact that Dickens visited Sudbury in 1834. On the 25th and 26th July in the same year, a Parliamentary by-election took place there, the incidents of which, as reported by the Essex Standard of that period, coincided remarkably with those recorded in connexion with the “Eatanswill” election in The Pickwick Papers. In 1835, Dickens visited Ipswich for The Morning Chronicle, and reported the election at that place. It is now tolerably certain that he went on to Sudbury for a similar purpose.

A further point is, Mr. Pickwick left by the Norwich coach. “Eatanswill,” as we have seen, being a small borough near Bury St. Edmunds, and on the Norwich coach route, as was Sudbury, the latter’s claim gains strength indeed, if it does not actually settle the question. At any rate, no other small borough could be named with any assurance that Dickens had it in his mind. Indeed, in the year 1834, there were only four Parliamentary boroughs in Suffolk, viz. Sudbury, Ipswich, Bury St. Edmunds and Eye. Ipswich, Mr. Pickwick visited AFTER the “Eatanswill” election, and does not hesitate to describe it under its right name. Moreover, the claims of Ipswich have been relinquished by even local literary men, who in 1905 actually proved that town to be topographically impossible and named Sudbury as the original. Bury St. Edmunds is the place to which Mr. Pickwick travelled AFTER leaving “Eatanswill,” and as that borough figures prominently in the book undisguised, it cannot be that. Eye is off the Norwich coach road, and no one has ever suggested that it has any claim to the honour. Sudbury alone, therefore, remains as presenting all the main features required for the original.

[illustration: The “Rose and Crown,” Sudbury. From a photograph]

In 1834 the “Rose and Crown,” Sudbury, was the headquarters of the “Blue” candidate, and so its claim to be the original of the “Town Arms,” Eatanswill, would seem to be well made out; and so serious and certain were the citizens of Sudbury on the point that they established an

Accepting this evidence, we naturally assume the “Rose and Crown” to be the “Town Arms,” which, late in the evening, Mr. Pickwick and his companions, assisted by Sam, dismounting from the roof of the Eatanswill coach, entered through an excited crowd assembled there. They found, however, the inn had no accommodation to offer, but through the friendliness of Mr. Pott, Mr. Pickwick and Winkle accompanied that gentleman to his home, whilst Mr. Tupman, Mr. Snodgrass and Sam repaired to the “Peacock.” They all first dined together at the “Town Arms” and arranged to reassemble there in the morning. It was here the barmaid was reported to have been bribed to “hocus the brandy and water of fourteen unpolluted electors as was a stopping in the house,” and where most of the exciting scenes of the election either took place, or had their rise in its precincts.

On the same authority we locate the “Swan” as being the original of the “Peacock,” the headquarters of the “buffs,” where Tupman and Snodgrass lodged, and where was told the Bagman’s story which brings us up against yet another problem — ”which was the inn on Marlborough Downs that plays so important a part in that narrative?”

We think, however, Mr. Charles G. Harper has solved the knotty point in his valuable book The Old Inns of Old England. He comes to the conclusion, by a process of elimination, that the “Waggon and Horses” at Beckhampton, which exists to-day, nearly realises the description of the inn given in the story. “It is,” he says, “just the house a needy bagman such as Tom Smart would have selected. It was in coaching days a homely yet comfortable inn, that received those travellers who did not relish either the state or the expense of the great Beckhampton Inn opposite, where post-horses were kept, and where the very elite of the roads resorted.”

[illustration: The “Waggon and Horses,” Beckhampton. Drawn by C. G. Harper]

If its comfort, as described in the following paragraph, is to-day equal to that found by Tom Smart, it is a place to seek for personal pleasure, as well as a Pickwickian landmark.

“In less than five minutes’ time, Tom was ensconced in the room opposite the bar — the very room where he had imagined the fire blazing — before a substantial matter-of-fact roaring fire, composed of something short of a bushel of coals, and wood enough to make half a dozen decent gooseberry bushes, piled half-way up the chimney, and roaring and crackling with a sound that of itself would have warmed the heart of any reasonable man. This was comfortable, but this was not all, for a smartly dressed girl, with a bright eye and a neat ankle, was laying a very clean white cloth on the table; and as Tom sat with his slippered feet on the fender, and his back to the open door, he saw a charming prospect of the bar reflected in the glass over the chimney-piece, with delightful rows of green bottles and gold labels, together with jars of pickles and preserves, and cheeses and boiled hams, and rounds of beef, arranged on shelves in the most tempting and delicious array. Well, that was comfortable, too; but even this was not all — for in the bar, seated at tea at the nicest possible little table, drawn close up before the brightest possible little fire, was a buxom widow of somewhere about eight-and- forty or thereabouts, with a face as comfortable as the bar, who was evidently the landlady of the house, and the supreme ruler over all these agreeable possessions.”

What happened afterwards is another story. Many other incidents occurred at Eatanswill during the Pickwickians’ stay there, the narration of which is not our purpose in these pages. One, however, led Sam and his master hurriedly to leave the town on a certain morning in pursuit of Alfred Jingle, who had put in an appearance at Mrs. Leo Hunter’s fancy-dress fete, and on seeing Mr. Pickwick there, had as quickly left it as he had entered it. Mr. Pickwick, on enquiry, discovering that Alfred Jingle, alias Charles Fitz Marshall, was residing at the “Angel,” Bury, set off in hot haste to hunt him down, determined to prevent him from deceiving anyone else as he had deceived him; and so we follow him in the next chapter.

CHAPTER VIII

THE “ANGEL,” BURY ST. EDMUNDS

“Beg your pardon, sir, is this Bury St. Edmunds?”

The words were addressed by Sam Weller to Mr. Pickwick as the two sat on top of a coach as it “rattled through the well-paved streets of a handsome little town, of thriving appearance.” Eventually stopping before “a large inn situated in a wide street, nearly facing the old Abbey,” Mr. Pickwick, looking up, added, ““and this is the “Angel.” We alight here, Sam. But some caution is necessary. Order a private room, and do not mention my name. You understand?”

““Right as a trivet, sir,” replied Mr. Weller, with a wink of intelligence; and having dragged Mr. Pickwick’s portmanteau from the hind boot, into which it had been hastily thrown when they joined the coach at Eatanswill, Mr. Weller disappeared on his errand. A private room was speedily engaged; and into it Mr. Pickwick was ushered without delay.” Having been settled comfortably therein, partaken of dinner and listened to Sam’s philosophy about a good night’s rest, he allowed that worthy to go and “worm ev’ry secret out o’ the boots’ heart” regarding the whereabouts of Fitz Marshall, as he assured Mr. Pickwick he could do in five minutes. As good as his word he returned with his information that the gentleman in question also had a private room in the “Angel,” but was dining out that night and had taken his servant with him. It was accordingly arranged that Sam should have a talk with the said servant in the morning with a view of learning what he could about his master’s plans.

“As it appeared that this was the best arrangement that could be made, it was finally agreed upon. Mr. Weller, by his master’s permission, retired to spend his evening in his own way; and was shortly afterwards elected, by the unanimous voice of the assembled company, into the tap-room chair, in which honourable post he acquitted himself so much to the satisfaction of the gentlemen-frequenters, that the roars of laughter and approbation penetrated to Mr. Pickwick’s bedroom, and shortened the term of his natural rest by at least three hours. Early on the ensuing morning Mr. Weller was dispelling all the feverish remains of the previous evening's conviviality, through the instrumentality of a halfpenny shower-bath (having induced a young gentleman attached to the stable department, by the offer of a coin, to pump over his head and face, until he was perfectly restored), when he was attracted by the appearance of a young fellow in mulberry-coloured livery, who was sitting on a bench in the yard, reading what appeared to be a hymn-book, with an air of deep abstraction, but who occasionally stole a glance at the individual under the pump, as if he took some interest in his proceedings, nevertheless."

This was no other than Job Trotter, the servant to Mr. Alfred Jingle of No Hall, No Where, and in a few moments the two were in animated conversation over a little liquid refreshment at the bar. How Job Trotter and Alfred Jingle not only got the better of the usually astute Sam and the innocent Mr. Pickwick, and entangled the latter into a very embarrassing situation at the Young Ladies' School in the district; and how the latter extricated himself from the awkward predicament only to find that the instigators of it had again hurriedly left the town, is best gathered from the pages of the book itself.

"The process of being washed in the night air, and rough-dried in a closet is as dangerous as it is peculiar." This having been the case with Mr. Pickwick, he suffered as a consequence, and was laid up with an attack of rheumatism, and had to spend a couple of days in his bed at the hotel. To pass away the time, he devoted himself to "editing" the love story of Nathaniel Pipkin, which he read to his friends, who, having by this time arrived at the hotel, gathered at his bedside and took their wine there with him.

It was whilst staying at the "Angel" that Mr. Pickwick received the first intimation that a writ for breach of promise had been issued against him at the instance of Mrs. Bardell, much to the alarm and amusement of his friends. He did not, however, hasten back to London, but accepted Mr. Wardle's invitation to a shooting party in the neighbourhood, where he again involved himself in a further misadventure.

[illustration: The Angel Hotel, Bury St. Edmunds. Drawn by C. G. Harper]

Now all these little untoward events happened whilst Mr. Pickwick was staying at the "Angel," and not only have they caused much amusement to the readers of the book, but incidentally have added fame and importance to the “Angel” at Bury to such an extent that the faithful reader of Pickwick who finds himself in the neighbourhood would no more think of passing the “Angel” than would the pilgrim to the town omit visiting the famous abbey. He will find the hotel little altered since the day when Mr. Pickwick visited it, either as regards its old-time atmosphere or its Victorian hospitality.

It is a very plain and severe-looking building from the outside, suggesting a gigantic doll’s house with real steps up to the front door all complete. Although it does not look as inspiring on approaching it as most Dickensian inns do, its interior, nevertheless, makes up in comfort what its exterior lacks in picturesqueness.

It has stood since 1779 and occupies the site of three ancient inns known at the time as the “Angel,” the “Castle” and the “White Bear,” respectively. In such an ancient town as Bury St. Edmunds, with so many years behind it, the “Angel” could tell a story worth narrating. Fronting the gates of the ancient Abbey, it occupies the most prominent place in the town. In the wide space before it the Bury fair was held, and a famous and fashionable festivity it was, which lasted in the olden time for several days. Latterly, however, one day is deemed sufficient, and that is September 21 in each year.

In spite of its sombre appearance from the outside, it is considered one of the most important hotels in West Suffolk, and is still a typical old English inn, “a byword for comfort and generous hospitality throughout the eastern counties.” The spacious coffee-room, its well-appointed drawing and sitting-rooms, its many bedrooms, have an appeal to those desiring ease rather than the luxuriousness of the modern style. In addition it has extensive yards and stables, survivals of the old posting days, with a cosy tap-room and bar, to say nothing of all the natural little nooks and corners and accessories which pertain only to old-world hostelries.

There still remains the pump under which Sam had his “halfpenny shower-bath.” And in the tap-room one can be easily reminded of the scene over which Sam presided and acquitted himself with so much satisfaction.

As to which was the room occupied by Mr. Pickwick, history is silent; but when Dickens was on his reporting expedition in Suffolk during the electoral campaign of 1835, he stayed at the “Angel” and, tradition says, slept in room No. 11. Mr. Percy FitzGerald, on visiting it some years ago, ventured to seek of the “gnarled” waiter information on the momentous question of Mr. Pickwick and his adventure.

“Pickwick, sir? Why, HE knew all about it,” was the reply. “No. 11 was Mr. Pickwick’s room, and the proprietor would tell us everything. A most quaint debate arose,” says Mr. FitzGerald, “on Mr. Pickwick’s stay at the hotel. The host pronounced EX CATHEDRA and without hesitation about the matter. . . . The power and vitality of the Pickwickian legend are extraordinary indeed; all day long we found people bewildered, as it were, by this faith, mixing up the author and his hero.”

This is not unusual, and even in these days we find that Dickens’s characters have become so real that no one stops to discuss whether this or that really happened to them, but just simply accepts their comings and goings as the comings and goings of the heroes and heroines of history are accepted, with perhaps just a little more belief in them. And so we can be assured that the “Angel” at Bury will be chiefly remembered as the hotel where Mr. Pickwick and his companions stayed, whoever before or since may have honoured it with a visit, or whatever else in its history may be recalled as important.

In 1861 Dickens again visited the town to give his famous readings from his works, and put up at the “Angel,” so that the county hotel has many reasons for the proud title of being a Dickensian inn.

CHAPTER IX

THE “BLACK BOY,” CHELMSFORD, THE “MAGPIE AND STUMP,” AND THE “BULL,” WHITECHAPEL

After Mr. Pickwick and Sam had been so cleverly outwitted by Jingle and Job Trotter at Bury, they returned to London. Taking liquid refreshment one day afterwards in a city hostelry they chanced upon the elder Weller, who, in the course of conversation, revealed the fact that, whilst “working” an Ipswich coach, he had taken up Jingle and Job Trotter at the “Black Boy” at Chelmsford: “I took ‘em up,” he emphasised, “right through to Ipswich, where the manservant — him in the mulberries — told me they was a-going to put up for a long time.” Mr. Pickwick decided to follow them, and started, as will be seen presently, from the Bull Inn, Whitechapel, for that town.

The reference to the “Black Boy” is but a passing one, and it is not even recorded that Mr. Pickwick stopped there on his journey out; but the inn where Jingle was “taken up” was then one of the best known on the Essex road, and was not demolished until 1857, when it was replaced by a modern public-house which still displays the old signboard. In an article in *The Dickensian Mr. G. O. Rickwood gives some interesting particulars concerning its history, from which we gather that originally the “Black Boy” was the town house of the de Veres, the famous Earls of Oxford, whose principal seat, Hedingham Castle, was within a short distance of Chelmsford. It was converted into a hostelry in the middle of the seventeenth century, and was first known as the Crown or New Inn. It was an ancient timber structure house, and some of the carved woodwork, with the well-known device of the boar’s head taken from one of the rooms of the old inn, is still preserved in Chelmsford Museum.

At the close of the eighteenth century the “Black Boy” was recognised as the leading hostelry of the town, and was known far and wide. In the Pickwickian days it was a busy posting-house for the coaches from London to many parts of Norfolk.

[illustration: The “Black Boy,” Chelmsford. From an old engraving]

Before Mr. Pickwick carried out his determination to pursue Jingle, he had occasion to visit the “Magpie and Stump,” “situated in a court, happy in the double advantage of being in the vicinity of Clare Market and closely approximating to the back of New Inn.” This was the favoured tavern, sacred to the evening orgies of Mr. Lowten and his companions, and by ordinary people would be designated a public-house. The object of Mr. Pickwick’s visit was to discover Mr. Lowten, and on enquiry, found him presiding over a sing-song and actually engaged in obliging with a comic song at the moment. After a brief interview with that worthy, Mr. Pickwick was prevailed upon to join the festive party.

[illustration: The “George the Fourth,” Clare Market. Drawn by C. G. Harper]

There were, at the time, two taverns, either of which might have stood as the original for the “Magpie and Stump”; the “Old Black Jack” and the “George the Fourth,” both in Portsmouth Street, and both were demolished in 1896. Which was the one Dickens had in mind it is difficult to say. His description of its appearance runs as follows: “In the lower windows, which were decorated with curtains of a saffron hue, dangled two or three printed cards, bearing reference to Devonshire cyder and Dantzic spruce, while a large blackboard, announcing in white letters to an enlightened public that there were 500,000 barrels of double stout in the cellars of the establishment, left the mind in a state of not unpleasing doubt and uncertainty, as to the precise direction in the bowels of the earth in which this mighty cavern might be supposed to extend. When we add that the weather-beaten signboard bore the half-obliterated semblance of a magpie intently eyeing a crooked streak of brown paint, which the neighbours had been taught from infancy to consider as the ‘stump,’ we have said all that need be said of the exterior of the edifice.”

The “Old Black Jack” has been identified as the original of the “Magpie and Stump” by some topographers, whilst Robert Allbut in his Rambles in Dickens-land favoured the “Old George the Fourth,” adding that Dickens and Thackeray were well-remembered visitors there.

The Bull Inn, Whitechapel, the starting-place of Tony Weller’s coach which was to take Mr. Pickwick to Ipswich, was actually at No. 25 Aldgate, and was perhaps the most famous of the group of inns of the neighbourhood whence many of the Essex, Suffolk and Norfolk coaches set out on their journeys. At the time of which we write it was owned by Mrs. Ann Nelson, whose antecedents had been born and bred in the business, while she herself had interests in more than one city hostelry, as well as owned coaches.

Mr. Charles G. Harper has several references to, and interesting anecdotes about, Mrs. Ann Nelson and her inns in his "Road" books. In one such reference he tells us Mrs. Ann Nelson was "one of those stern, dignified, magisterial women of business, who were quite a remarkable feature of the coaching age, who saw their husbands off to an early grave and alone carried on the peculiarly exacting double business of inn-keeping and coach-proprietorship, and did so with success." She was the "Napoleon and Caesar" combined of the coaching business. Energetic, she spared neither herself nor her servants. The last to bed she was also the first to rise, "looking after the stable people and seeing that the horses had their feeds and were properly cared for." Insistent as she was on rigid punctuality in all things, and hard as she was on those who served her, she, nevertheless, treated them very well, and gave the coachmen and guards a special room, where they dined as well at reduced prices as any of the coffee-room customers. This room was looked upon as their private property, and there they regaled themselves with the best the house could provide. It was more sacred and exclusive than the commercial-rooms of the old Bagmen days, and was strictly unapproachable by any but those for whom it was set apart.

The "Bull" began to decline when the railway was opened in 1839, and in 1868 it was demolished.

There is no doubt that Dickens knew it well, and probably used it in his journalistic days when having to take journeys to the eastern counties to report election speeches. In The Uncommercial Traveller he speaks of having strolled up to the empty yard of the "Bull," "who departed this life I don't know when, and whose coaches had all gone I don't know where."

When, therefore, he wanted a starting-point for Mr. Pickwick's adventure to Ipswich, the "Bull," which was nothing less than an institution at the time, readily occurred to him.

There is an anecdote about Dickens and the coachmen's private apartment, told by Mr. Charles G. Harper. "On one occasion Dickens had a seat at a table, and ‘the Chairman,’ after sundry flattering remarks, as a tribute to the novelist’s power of describing a coach Journey, said, ‘Mr. Dickens, we knows you knows wot’s wot, but can you, sir, ‘andle a vip?’ There was no mock modesty in Dickens. He acknowledged he could describe a journey down the road, but he regretted that in the management of a ‘vip’ he was not expert.”

Here Sam arrived one morning with his master’s travelling bag and portmanteau, to be closely followed by Mr. Pickwick himself, who, as Sam told his father, was “cabbin’ it . . . havin’ two mile o’ danger at eightpence.” In the inn yard he was greeted by a red-haired man who immediately became friendly and enquired if Mr. Pickwick was going to Ipswich. On learning that he was, and that he, too, had taken an outside seat, they became fast friends. Little did Mr. Pickwick suppose that his newly made friend and he would meet again later under less congenial circumstances.

“Take care o’ the archway, gen’l’men,” was Sam’s timely warning as the coach, under the control of his father, started out of the inn yard on its memorable journey down Whitechapel Road to the “Great White Horse,” Ipswich, an hostelry which forms the subject of the following chapter.

CHAPTER X

THE “GREAT WHITE HORSE,” IPSWICH

“In the main street of Ipswich, on the left-hand side of the way, a short distance after you have passed through the open space fronting the Town Hall, stands an inn known far and wide by the appellation of the ‘Great White Horse,’ rendered the more conspicuous by a stone statue of some rampacious animal with flowing mane and tail, distantly resembling an insane cart horse, which is elevated above the principal door.”

With these identical words Dickens introduces his readers to, and indicates precisely, the position of the famous Great White Horse Inn at Ipswich, and a visitor to the popular city of Suffolk need have no better guide to the spot than the novelist. He will be a little surprised at the description of the white horse, which in reality is quite an unoffending and respectable animal, in the act of simply lifting its fore leg in a trotting action, that is all; but he will be well repaid if when he arrives there he reads again Chapter XXII of The Pickwick Papers before he starts to make himself acquainted with the intricacies of the interior.

That chapter, telling of the extraordinary adventure Mr. Pickwick experienced with the middle-aged lady in the double-bedded room, is one of the most amusing in the book, and one which has made the “Great White Horse” as familiar a name as any in fiction or reality.

There are few inns in the novelist’s books described so fully. He must have known it well; indeed, he is supposed to have stayed there when, in his early days, he visited Ipswich to report an election for The Morning Chronicle; and probably a similar mistake happened to him to that which Mr. Pickwick experienced. So when he says, “The ‘Great Horse’ is famous in the neighbourhood, in the same degree as a prize ox, or county paper-chronicled turnip, or unwieldy pig — for its enormous size,” he evidently was recalling an impression of those days.

[illustration: The White Horse Hotel, Ipswich. Drawn by L. Walker]

It is an imposing structure viewed from without, with stuccoed walls, and a pillared entrance, over which stands the sign which so attracted the novelist's attention. The inside is spacious, with still the air of the old days about it, and contains fifty bedrooms and handsome suites of rooms; but Dickens was a little misleading regarding its size and a little unkind in his reproaches. At any rate, if the seemingly unkind things he said of it were deserved in those days of which he writes, they are no longer.

"Never were such labyrinths of uncarpeted passages," he says; "such clusters of mouldy, ill-lighted rooms, such huge numbers of small dens for eating or sleeping in, beneath any one roof, as are collected together between the four walls of the Great White Horse Inn."

Here on a certain very eventful day appeared Mr. Pickwick, who was to have met his friends there, but as they had not arrived when he and Mr. Peter Magnus reached it by coach, he accepted the latter's invitation to dine with him.

Dickens's disparaging descriptions of the inn's accommodation lead one to believe that his experiences of the "over-grown tavern," as he calls it, were not of the pleasantest. He refers to the waiter as a corpulent man with "a fortnight's napkin" under his arm, and "coeval stockings," and tells how this worthy ushered Mr. Pickwick and Mr. Magnus into "a large badly furnished apartment, with a dirty grate, in which a small fire was making a wretched attempt to be cheerful, but was fast sinking beneath the dispiriting influence of the place." Here they made their repast from a "bit of fish and a steak," and "having ordered a bottle of the most horrible port wine, at the highest possible price, for the good of the house, drank brandy and water for their own." After finishing their scanty meal they were conducted to their respective bedrooms, each with a japanned candlestick, through "a multitude of torturous windings." Mr. Pickwick's "was a tolerably large double-bedded room, with a fire; upon the whole, a more comfortable looking apartment than Mr. Pickwick's short experience of the accommodation of the 'Great White Horse' had led him to expect."

Whether all this was ever true does not seem to have mattered much to the various proprietors, for they were not only proud of the association of the inn with Pickwick, but made no attempt to hide what the novelist said of its shortcomings. On the contrary, one of them printed in a little booklet the whole of the particular chapter wherein these disrespectful remarks appear. Indeed, that is the chief means of advertisement to lure the traveller in, and when he gets there he finds Pickwick pictures everywhere on the walls to dispel any doubt he might have of the associations.

It is not necessary to re-tell the story of Mr. Pickwick's misadventure here. It will be recalled that having forgotten his watch he, in a weak moment, walked quietly downstairs, with the japanned candlestick in his hand, to secure it again. "The more stairs Mr. Pickwick went down, the more stairs there seemed to be to descend, and again and again, when Mr. Pickwick got into some narrow passage, and began to congratulate himself on having gained the ground floor, did another flight of stairs appear before his astonished eyes. . . . Passage after passage did he explore; room after room did he peep into"; until at length he discovered the room he wanted and also his watch.

The same difficulty confronted him on his journey backward; indeed, it was even more perplexing. "Rows of doors, garnished with boots of every shape, make, and size, branched off in every possible direction." He tried a dozen doors before he found what he thought was his room and proceeded to divest himself of his clothes preparatory to entering on his night's rest. But, alas! he had got into the wrong bedroom and the story of the dilemma he shortly found himself in with the lady in the yellow curl-papers, and how he extricated himself in so modest and gentlemanly a manner, is a story which "every schoolboy knows."

Having disentangled himself from the dilemma, he found the intricacies of the "White Horse's" landings and stairs again too much for him, until he was discovered, crouching in a recess in the wall, by his faithful servant Sam, who conducted him to his right room. Here Mr. Pickwick made a wise resolve that if he were to stop in the "Great White Horse" for six months, he would never trust himself about in it alone again.

We do not suppose that the visitor would encounter the same difficulty to-day in getting about the house as did Mr. Pickwick; but torturous passages are there all the same; and by virtue of Mr. Pickwick's experiences they are perhaps more noticeable than would otherwise appear had not his adventures been given to the world. And so the fact remains that Mr. Pickwick's spirit seems to haunt the building, and no attempt is made to disabuse the mind that his escapade was anything but an amusing if unfortunate reality.

The double-bedded room is a double-bedded room still, with its old four-posters, and is shown with great pride to visitors from all over the world as "Mr. Pickwick's room." The beds are still hung with old-fashioned curtains, and a rush-bottomed chair has its place there, as it did during Mr.

Pickwick's visit. Even the wall-paper is not of a modern pattern, and may have survived from that historic night. At least these things were the same when we last visited it.

Indeed, all the rooms have still the atmosphere of the Victorian era about them. The coffee-room, the bar-parlour, the dining-room, the courtyard and the assembly room reflect the Pickwickian period, which in other words speak of "home-life ease and comfort," and "are not subordinate to newfangled ideas." Whether the small room in the vicinity of the stable-yard, where Mr. Weller, senior, was engaged in preparing for his journey to London, taking sustenance, and incidentally discussing "Widders" with his son Sam, exists to-day we are unable to state with any certainty; but no doubt there is one which would fill the bill. Which, too, was the particular room where Mr. Pickwick and Mr. Tupman were arrested, the former on the charge of intending to fight a duel, and the latter as aider and abettor, history does not relate, or modern research reveal.

The inn is some four hundred years old, and at one time was known as the White Horse Tavern. George II is said to have stayed there some three hundred years ago, and so, report has it, did Nelson and Lady Hamilton; but these are small matters compared to the larger ones connected with Mr. Pickwick, and merit but passing record. Whilst those details concerning the fictitious character can be adjusted by any enthusiast who stays at the "Great White Horse" on a Pickwickian pilgrimage, no tangible trace that the three other historical personages used the inn remains to substantiate the fact, although the tradition is acceptable.

CHAPTER XI

THE “GEORGE AND VULTURE”

Tucked away in the heart of the busiest part of the roaring city, overshadowed by tall, hard-looking, modern banking and insurance buildings and all but a thin strip of it hidden from view, is a veritable piece of old London.

This is the “George and Vulture,” known throughout the world as the tavern that Mr. Pickwick and his friends made their favourite city headquarters. The address in the directory of this inn is St. Michael’s Alley, Cornhill; The Pickwick Papers, however, describe it as being in George Yard, Lombard Street. Both are correct. If the latter address is followed, the inn is not easy to find, for the sign “Old Pickwickian Hostel” is so high up over the upper window in the far left-hand corner that it is almost the last thing one sees. One fares little better from the other approach, for the narrow alley with its tall buildings facing each other so closely as to be almost touched with outstretched arms, makes it necessary to search for the entrance doorway.

These, however, are not drawbacks to the lover of old London, for he rather prefers to probe about for things he likes, particularly when, as in this case, the discovery is worth the trouble; for once inside the “George and Vulture” the pilgrim will be thoroughly recompensed for the trouble he has taken in finding it. Here he will be struck by the atmosphere of old time which still prevails, even though there are signs that the modern has somewhat supplanted the old. Not long since the dining-room on the ground floor was well sawdusted, and partitioned off in the old coffee-room style, and some of these high-backed box-like compartments still remain in corners of the room. With the knowledge that this ancient hostelry was called “Thomas’s Chop House” — and it still bears that name ground on the glass doors — one expects to discover a grill loaded up with fizzing chops and steaks, and there it will be found, presided over by the white-garbed chef turning over the red-hot morsels.

Opposite the door is the old-fashioned bar, with a broad staircase winding up by its side to another dining-room above completely partitioned off into compartments with still another grill and a spotlessly robed chef in evidence. Up another flight of stairs we come to yet one more dining-room recently decorated in the old style, with oak-beamed ceiling and surroundings to match; with lantern lights suspended from the oak beams, grandfather clock, warming pan, pewter plates and odd pieces of furniture in keeping with the period it all seeks to recall. It is called the "Pickwick Room," and this metamorphosis was carried out by a city business firm for the accommodation of its staff at lunch, and its good friendship toward them admirably reflects the Dickens spirit. Here the members of the general staff, both ladies and gentlemen, numbering about 170, daily gather for their mid-day meal; whilst a small cosy room adjoining is set apart for the managerial heads. On occasions, representatives of associated houses in the city and from abroad, calling on business, are cordially invited to join the luncheon party.

There is an interesting Visitors' Book in the Pickwick Room, wherein guests are asked to inscribe their names and designations; also a private or business motto. Custom has it that a man only signs the book once, however many times he may visit the Pickwick Room, unless his official position has altered through business promotion.

This being the floor tradition has decided was Mr. Pickwick's bedroom, it is suitably decorated with Pickwickian and Dickensian pictures and ornaments, all tending to remind the visitor of the homely period of the past. There are no bedrooms to-day in the inn, nor are there any comfortable so-called sitting- or coffee-rooms, for all the available space is required for satisfying the hungry city man.

The history of the "George and Vulture" goes back some centuries. Originally it was the London lodging of Earl Ferrers, and in 1175 a brother of his was slain there in the night. It was then called simply the "George," and described by Stow, the great historian of London, as "a common hostelry for travellers."

[illustration: The "George and Vulture." Drawn by L. Walker]

Ultimately the "Vulture," for reasons undiscovered by the present writer, was added to the sign, and the appellation the "George and Vulture" has come through the history of London unaltered, gathering with the flight of time many famous associations to keep its memory green in each succeeding period, until Mr. Pickwick put the coping-stone to its fame as one of London's imperishable heritages.

Poets and literary men of all degrees frequented it from the earliest times, and although there is no record available to substantiate a claim that the great Chaucer used the house, it seems possible that his father, who was himself a licensed victualler in the district, knew it well. But John Skelton, the satirical poet of the fifteenth century, undoubtedly enjoyed its hospitality, for he has left record in the following lines that he was acquainted with it: Intent on. signs, the prying eye, The George & Vulture will descry. Let none the outward Vulture fear, No Vulture host inhabits here. If too well used you deem ye then Take your revenge and come agen.

Taverns in those days were the resort of most of the prominent men of the day, and were used in the same manner by them as the clubs of the present time, as a friendly meeting place for business men, authors, artists, lawyers, doctors, actors and the fashionable persons of leisured ease with no particular calling, all of whom treated "mine host" as an equal and not as a servant.

And so we find that men like Addison and Steele were much in evidence at these friendly gatherings of their day; that Jonathan Swift and his coterie foregathered in some cosy corner to discuss the pros and cons of that great fraud, the South Sea Bubble; that Daniel Defoe was a constant guest of the host of his time; that John Wilkes and his fellow-members of "The Hell Fire Club" used the house for their meetings, and many others the recital of whose names would resolve into a mere catalogue.

In 1666 the inn succumbed to the Great Fire; but after the rebuilding its fame was re-established and has never since waned. John Strype, the ecclesiastical historian, in his addenda to Stow's Survey of London, records that "Near Ball Alley was the George Inn, since the fire rebuilt, with very good houses and warehouses, being a large open yard, and called George Yard, at the farther end of which is the 'George and Vulture' Tavern, which is a large house and having great trade, and having a passage into St. Michael's Alley."

The yard referred to is now filled with large buildings, but when it existed as part of the inn was used, like other inn yards, by the travelling companies of players for the enactment of their mystery and morality plays. It was in the "George and Vulture," so it is recorded, that the first Beefsteak Club was formed by Richard Estcourt, the Drury Lane comedian, a fashion which spread in all directions. And so the history of the "George and Vulture" could be traced, and anecdotes relating to it set down to fill many pages.

But whilst admitting that these antiquarian notes have their interest for their own sake, we must leave them in order that we may glance at the Pickwickian traditions, through which the tavern is known to-day.

In our last chapter we left Mr. Pickwick at the “Great White Horse,” Ipswich. On his return to London he had, perforce, to abandon his lodgings in Goswell Street and so transferred his abode to very good old-fashioned and comfortable quarters, to wit, the George and Vulture Tavern and Hotel, George Yard, Lombard Street, and forthwith sent Sam to settle the little matters of rent and such-like trifles and to bring back his little odds and ends from Goswell Street. This done they shortly left the tavern for Dingley Dell, where they had a royal Christmas time. That the tavern appealed to Mr. Pickwick as ideal for the entertainment of friends is incidentally revealed in the record that after one of the merry evenings at Mr. Wardle’s he, on waking late next morning, had “a confused recollection of having severally and confidentially invited somewhere about five and forty people to dine with him at the ‘George and Vulture’ the very first time they came to London.”

Just before they left Dingley Dell, Bob Sawyer, “thrusting his forefinger between two of Mr. Pickwick’s ribs and thereby displaying his native drollery and his knowledge of the anatomy of the human frame at one and the same time, enquired — ‘I say, old boy, where do you hang out?’ Mr. Pickwick replied that he was at present suspended at the ‘George and Vulture’!”

Whether Mr. Pickwick had some idea of finding other quarters when he said he was “at present suspended” we do not know; at all events he made the tavern his London residence until, at the end of his adventures, he retired to Dulwich. Before, however, he settled down there, many incidents connected with his career took place within the walls of his favourite tavern. It was in his sitting-room here that the subpoenas re Bardell v. Pickwick were served on his three friends and Sam Weller on behalf of the plaintiff. The Pickwickians were seated round the fire after a comfortable dinner when Mr. Jackson, the plaintiff’s man, by his unexpected appearance, disturbed their happy gathering. It was from the “George and Vulture” they all drove to the Guildhall on the day of the trial, and it was in Mr. Pickwick’s room in the tavern that he vowed to Mr. Perker he would never pay even a halfpenny of the damages.

The next morning the Pickwickians again continued their travels, Bath being their choice of place. Returning after a week's absence, we are told that Mr. Pickwick with Sam "straightway returned to his old quarters at the 'George and Vulture.'" Before another week elapsed the fateful and inevitable day came when Mr. Pickwick was arrested and eventually conveyed to the Fleet Prison. He was in bed at the time, and so annoyed was Sam that he threatened to pitch the officer of the law out of the window into the yard below. Mr. Pickwick's deliverance from prison took him once again to the "George and Vulture," and to him came Arabella Allan and Winkle to announce to him that they were man and wife and made it their place of residence whilst Mr. Pickwick went off to Birmingham to make peace with Nathaniel's father. Mr. Winkle, senior, eventually visited the old hostel and formally approved of his daughter-in-law.

It was whilst in the inn also that Sam Weller received the news of the death of his "mother-in-law," conveyed in the extraordinary letter from his father, which he read to Mary in one of the window seats.

Here, also, came Tony Weller to make his offer of the L530 "reduced counsels" which he had inherited, to Mr. Pickwick, adding — "P'raps it'll go a little way towards the expenses o' that 'ere conviction. All I say is, just you keep it till I ask you for it again," and bolted out of the room.

The last specific reference to the "George and Vulture" is on the occasion when the party left it to join Mr. Wardle and other friends at dinner at Osborne's Adelphi Hotel. So, it will be seen, from the first mention of the tavern about midway through the book, until its closing pages, the "George and Vulture" may be said to have been Mr. Pickwick's headquarters in London.

Is it, therefore, to be wondered at, considering all the incidents and events these few references recall, that the whole atmosphere of the "George and Vulture" positively reeks with Pickwick?

Is it surprising that the various proprietors of the inn have from time to time cherished these associations, and none more so than the present genial proprietor and his efficient manager, Mr. Woods, and have reminded their customers each time they dine there of Mr. Pickwick's connection with it by placing before them plates with that immortal man's portrait in the act of addressing his club, printed thereon?

Is it to be wondered at that the City Pickwick Club should hold its meetings and dinners there, or that the Dickens Fellowship should choose it as the most appropriate spot for the entertainment of their American and colonial visitors, and occasionally to have convivial gatherings of its members there?

And will it surprise anyone if a universal agitation is set on foot to preserve it from the axe and pick of the builder which threatens it in the near future?

There is one extraordinarily interesting piece of history relative to the “George and Vulture” and Pickwick with which fittingly to close this account of London’s famous inn.

In 1837, the year that The Pickwick Papers appeared in monthly-parts, a Circulating Book Society had its headquarters at the “George and Vulture.” On the occasion of the meeting held on March 30, 1837, it was proposed that The Pickwick Papers, “now in course of publication, be taken in for circulation.”

This motion was opposed by two members “who considered the work vulgar.” The motion, however, was carried with the amendment “that the work, when complete, be obtained and circulated as one volume.” In 1838 this famous copy of the immortal work was sold by auction amongst the members, in what was probably the very room Dickens had in mind when describing the meetings of Mr. Pickwick and his friends. It was bought by J. Buckham for 13s. 6d. This copy was annotated by the owner with notes, historical and explanatory, and is now a cherished possession of the nation in the safe custody of the Library of the British Museum, where it is known as the “George and Vulture” copy.

CHAPTER XII

THE “BLUE BOAR,” “LEADENHALL MARKET,” GARRAWAY’S,” AND THE “WHITE HORSE CELLAR”

The “Blue Boar,” Leadenhall Market, was an inn of considerable Pickwickian importance. It was the elder Weller’s favourite house of call, and it will be remembered that Sam was sent for by his father on one occasion to meet him there at six o’clock. Having obtained Mr. Pickwick’s permission to absent himself from the “George and Vulture,” Sam sauntered down as far as the Mansion House, and then by easy stages wended his way towards Leadenhall Market, through a variety of by-streets and courts, purchasing a Valentine on his way.

Looking round him he beheld a signboard on which the painter’s art had delineated something remotely resembling a cerulean elephant with an aquiline nose in lieu of a trunk. Rightly conjecturing that this was the “Blue Boar” himself, he stepped into the house and enquired concerning his parent. Finding that his father would not be there for three-quarters of an hour or more, he ordered from the barmaid “nine penn’orth o’ brandy and water hike, and the ink-stand,” and having settled himself in the little parlour, composed himself to write that wonderful “valentine” to Mary. Just as Sam had finished his missive his father appeared on the scene, and he was invited by the dutiful son to listen to what he had written. Tony heard it through, punctuating it during the process with a running commentary and much advice on marriage in general and “widders” in particular.

It was here, too, that Tony, with the laudable intention of helping Mr. Pickwick, offered the invaluable, and now historic, advice concerning an “alleybi,” there being, as he asserted, “nothing like a’ alleybi, Sammy, nothing.”

It was in the same parlour on the same occasion that Mr. Weller, senior, informed his son that he had two tickets “as was sent” to Mrs. Weller by the Shepherd “for the monthly meetin’ o’ the Brick Lane Branch o’ the United Grand Junction Ebenezer Temperance Association.” He communicated the secret “with great glee and winked so indefatigably after doing so,” “over a double glass o’ the invariable,” that he and Sam determined to make use of the tickets with the projected plan of exposing the “real propensities and qualities of the red-nosed man,” the success of which is so well remembered.

These facts in mind the “Blue Boar” ought not to be passed over lightly, even though it cannot be identified by name, or its existence traced in historic records. In those days the description of the locality given by Dickens was accurate enough; but although there were many inns and taverns in its district, topographers have never discovered a “Blue Boar,” or learned that one ever bore such a sign. There was a “Bull” in Leadenhall Street at one time, and possibly this may have been the inn the novelist made the scene of the above incidents, simply giving it a name of his own to afford scope for his whimsical vein in describing it.

However, the locality has changed completely from what it was when Tony Weller “used the parlour” of the “Blue Boar,” and such coaching inns that flourished then have all been swept away with the “shabby courts and alleys.”

We find, however, a picture purporting to be the “Blue Boar” with its galleries, horses and stable boys all complete drawn by Herbert Railton, in the Jubilee edition of The Pickwick Papers. Probably this is purely an imaginary picture.

On the other hand, there was nothing visionary about Garraway’s. “Garraway’s, twelve o’clock. ‘Dear Mrs. B., Chops and Tomato Sauce, Yours, Pickwick,’” not only implicated Mr. Pickwick, but conjured up an old and historic coffee house of city fame. It stood in Exchange Alley, and was a noted meeting-place for city men, and for its sales and auctions. It was demolished some fifty years ago after an existence of over two hundred years. It claimed to be the first to sell tea “according to the directions of the most knowing merchants and travellers into the eastern countries,” but ultimately became more famous for its sandwiches and sherry. No doubt it was the latter, or something even more substantial, that Mr. Pickwick had been indulging during the day he wrote that momentous message. Garraway’s was known to Defoe, Dean Swift, Steele and others, each of whom have references to it in their books, and during its affluent days it was never excelled by other taverns in the city for good fare and comfort. It was there that the “South Sea Bubblers” frequently met.

Garraway’s is mentioned in other books of Dickens. In Martin Chuzzlewit, for instance, Nadgett, who undertook the task of making secret enquiries for the Anglo-Bengalee business, used to sit in Garraway’s, and was occasionally seen drying a damp pocket handkerchief before the fire, looking over his shoulder for the man who never appeared.

It is also referred to in Little Dorrit as one of the coffee houses frequented by Mr. Flintwich.

In The Uncommercial Traveller, in writing about the “City of the Absent,” Dickens makes this further allusion to the tavern:

“There is an old monastery-crypt under Garraway’s (I have been in it among the port wine), and perhaps Garraway’s, taking pity on the mouldy men who wait in its public room, all their lives, gives them cool house-room down there on Sundays.”

Again in Christmas Stories the narrator of the “Poor Relation’s Story” who lived in a lodging in the Clapham Road, tells how, amongst other things, he used to sit in Garraway’s Coffee House in the city to pass away the time until it was time to dine, afterwards returning to his lodgings in the evening.

But of all these references, Mr. Pickwick’s mention of Garraway’s in his note to Mrs. Bardell is the one which will prevent its name and fame from being forgotten more than any other incident connected with it that we know of.

The “White Horse Cellar” from which the Pickwickians set out on the coach journey to Bath stood, at the time, at the corner of Arlington Street, Piccadilly, on the site occupied by the “Ritz” to-day. It was as famous and notorious as any coaching office in London; perhaps being in close proximity to the park and being in the west end, more famous than any.

In those flourishing days of its existence it was the starting-point of all the mails for the west of England, and was a bustling centre of activity. It was, apparently, one of the “sights” of London, for on fine evenings those with leisure on their hands would gather to watch the departure of these coaches. The scene became more like a miniature fair, with itinerants selling oranges, pencils, sponges and such-like commodities, to the passengers and the spectators.

Mr. Pickwick chose to take an early morning coach, perhaps to avoid the sightseers. In his anxiety he arrived much too soon and had to take shelter in the travellers' room — the last resort, as Dickens assures us, of human dejection.

“The travellers' room at the ‘White Horse Cellar’ is, of course, uncomfortable,” he writes; “it would be no travellers' room if it were not. It is the right-hand parlour, into which an aspiring kitchen fire-place appears to have walked, accompanied by a rebellious poker, tongs and shovel. It is divided into boxes for the solitary confinement of travellers, and is furnished with a clock, a looking-glass, and a live waiter, which latter article is kept in a small kennel for washing glasses in a corner of the apartment.”

Whilst taking his breakfast therein, Mr. Pickwick made the acquaintance of Mr. and Mrs. Dowler, also bound for Bath, who were to play such an unexpected part in his sojourn in the famous watering-place.

It was outside the “White Horse Cellar” that Sam Weller made that discovery about the use of Mr. Pickwick's name which so annoyed him. Whilst the party were mounting the coach he observed that the proprietor's name, written in bold letters on the coach, was no other than “Pickwick.” He drew his master's attention to it, but Mr. Pickwick merely thought it a very extraordinary thing. Sam, on the other hand, was of the opinion that the “properiator” was playing some “imperence” with them. “Not content,” he said, “vith writin' up Pickwick, they puts ‘Moses’ afore it, vich I call addin' insult to injury, as the parrot said ven they not only took him from his native land, but made him talk the English langvidge arterwards.”

The “White Horse Cellar” ultimately was moved to the opposite side of Piccadilly, and in 1884, the new “White Horse” in turn was pulled down, upon whose site was erected the “Albemarle.”

The “White Horse Cellar” is also mentioned in Bleak House in the communication from Kenge and Carboys to Esther Summerson as her halting-place in London. Here she was met by their clerk, Mr. Guppy, who later, in his declaration of love to her, reminded her of his services on that occasion — “I think you must have seen that I was struck with those charms on the day when I waited at the whytorseller. I think you must have remarked that I could not forbear a tribute to those charms when I put up the steps of the ‘ackney coach.”

CHAPTER XIII

FOUR BATH INNS AND THE “BUSH,” BRISTOL

On their arrival at Bath, Mr. Pickwick and his friends and Mr. Dowler and his wife “respectively retired to their private sitting-rooms at the White Hart Hotel, opposite the great Pump Room . . . where waiters, from their costume, might be mistaken for Westminster boys, only they destroyed the illusion by behaving themselves so much better.”

Mr. Pickwick had scarcely finished his breakfast next morning when Mr. Dowler brought in no less a person than his friend, Angelo Cyrus Bantam, Esquire, to introduce to him, and to administer his stock greeting, “Welcome to Ba-ath, sir. This is, indeed, an acquisition. Most welcome to Ba-ath, sir.”

For the story of the various adventures which overtook the Pickwickians in the famous city, what they saw, and what they did, the reader must be referred to the official chronicle, except where they are connected with some inn or tavern.

So far as the “White Hart” is concerned, there is little to be said in this direction. After the reception at the Assembly Rooms on the evening after their arrival, Mr. Pickwick accompanied his friends back to the “White Hart,” and “having soothed his feelings with something hot, went to bed, and to sleep, almost simultaneously.”

As Mr. Pickwick contemplated staying in Bath for at least two months, he deemed it advisable to take lodgings for himself and his friends for that period. This he did, and the “White Hart” has no further association with his person during his stay in the gay city.

The “White Hart,” nevertheless, has a very strong claim to Pickwickian fame, apart from the brief fact that the founder of the club stayed there a night or two. At the time, the “White Hart” belonged to the very Moses Pickwick whose name on the coach so worried poor Sam Weller at the start of their journey down from London.

[illustration: The “White Hart,” Bath. From an engraving]

This Moses Pickwick was a grandson of Eleazer Pickwick, who, it is recorded, was a foundling. The story told concerning him is that when an infant he was picked up by a lady in the village of Wick near Bath, carried to her home, adopted and educated. Hence, according to some, the name Pick-Wick. There is, however, a village near to hand actually called "Pickwick," which may also have inspired the name for the foundling.

For some reasons unknown, or, at any rate, unrevealed, this foundling developed a craze for the coaching business, and, ultimately, taking service in one of the coaching inns, devoted his time and interests whole-heartedly to the profession, or calling. Eventually he became the owner of the business.

His grandson, Moses, became even more famous during the coaching era than his foundling antecedent, and at the time Pickwick was written he was the actual proprietor of the White Hart Hotel, as well as of the coaches which ran to and from it. He became, also, the most popular owner in the trade, and retired to the village of Upper Swanswick a rich man. We believe the name is still perpetuated in the neighbourhood.

Now it is known as a fact that Dickens took the name Pickwick from the said Moses Pickwick the proprietor of the "White Hart," whose coaches he had seen and ridden in a year or two previously. So that apart from the brief references to the inn in The Pickwick Papers its history is very much associated with the book.

Unfortunately, Dickens does not give us any minute description of it, as he does of other inns. Although it was the most important coaching house in the city, it could not be spoken of as particularly attractive in appearance. It looked more like a barracks than an hotel, indeed, we believe it was used for such a purpose in its degenerate days before it was finally demolished in 1867.

During its prosperous era, it was the resort of all the distinguished visitors who flocked to Bath during those gay and festive times.

There is still a relic of it in existence. The gracefully carved effigy of a white hart, which decorated the front of the building, now serves a similar purpose on an inn with the same name in the suburb of Widcombe, near by. On the site of the old house now stands the Grand Pump Room Hotel.

The Royal Hotel to which Mr. Winkle resorted, after his adventure with the valorous Dowler, for the purpose of escape to Bristol by the branch coach, probably never existed — at any rate, by that name. Dickens may have had the “York House” in his mind, for he stayed there himself on one occasion, and it was one of those ornate hotels, accustomed to receiving royal and distinguished visitors, suggesting such a title as Dickens gave it.

There is, however, a tavern in Bath which claimed — or was made to claim — a Pickwickian association, and that is the Beaufort Arms. The story in connection with it is that before it was a tavern it was originally “the small greengrocer’s shop” over which the Bath footmen held their social evenings, and was, therefore, the scene of the memorable “leg o’ mutton swarry,” given in honour of Sam Weller. This may be so; we prefer to think that it was more likely to have been the public-house from which, as we are told, drinks were fetched for that dignified function.

The “Saracen’s Head” in the same city has a Dickensian, if not a Pickwickian, interest, for Dickens stayed there when, in his journalistic days, he was following Lord John Russell through the country in 1835, reporting his speeches. We can be sure that it was during this brief visit that he gained an insight into the social doings and customs of the city, and also gathered the extensive knowledge of its topography his book exhibits. The “Saracen’s Head” is proud of its Dickens associations; the actual chair he sat in, the actual jug he drank from, and the actual room he slept in are each shown with much ado to visitors; whilst several anecdotes associated with the novelist’s visit on the occasion are re-told with perfect assurance of their truth.

Arriving at Bristol after his flight from Mr. Dowler at Bath, Mr. Winkle took up his quarters at the “Bush,” there only to encounter later in the day “the figure of the vindictive and sanguinary Dowler” himself. Explanations soon smoothed over their little differences, and they parted for the night “with many protestations of eternal friendship.”

[illustration: The “Bush,” Bristol. From an engraving]

In the meantime, Sam Weller had been sent posthaste on Mr. Winkle’s heels with instructions from Mr. Pickwick to lock him in his bedroom as soon as he found him. Sam was nothing loath, and when he had run Winkle to earth at the “Bush”, promptly carried out his master’s orders and awaited his further instructions as to what to do next. These were brought next morning by Mr. Pickwick, in person, when he walked into the coffee-loom. Satisfaction being arrived at, the three stayed on at the “Bush” for a day or two, experiencing some curious adventures in the neighbourhood during the time.

On another occasion Mr. Pickwick and Sam stayed at the “Bush,” and after dinner the former adjourned to the travellers’ room, where, Sam informed him, “there was only a gentleman with one eye, and the landlord, who were drinking a bowl of bishop together.”

“He’s a queer customer, the vun-eyed vun, sir,” observed Mr. Weller, as he led the way. “He’s a-gammonin’ that ‘ere landlord, he is, sir, till he don’t rightly know vether he’s standing on the soles of his boots or on the crown of his hat.”

This was no other than the man who told the story of Tom Smart at the “Peacock,” Eatanswill, and he was ready and willing to tell another; with little persuasion he settled down and related the story of the Bagman’s Uncle.

The “Bush” was, in its time, the chief coaching inn of the city, and one of the headquarters of Moses Pickwick’s coaching business. It stood until 1864, near the Guildhall, and its site is now occupied by Lloyd’s Bank. This was another inn that Dickens stayed at in 1835 whilst reporting for The Morning Chronicle. Writing from that address he says he expects to forward the conclusion of Russell’s dinner “by Cooper’s company coach, leaving the ‘Bush’ at half-past six next morning; and by the first Bell’s coach on Thursday he will forward the report of the Bath dinner, endorsing the parcel for immediate delivery with extra rewards for the porter.”

CHAPTER XIV

THE “FOX UNDER THE HILL,” OTHER LONDON TAVERNS, AND THE “SPANIARDS,” HAMPSTEAD

On his return from Bath, Mr. Pickwick was immediately arrested and conveyed to the Fleet Prison. In the course of the chapters following this event there are several inns or taverns either mentioned incidentally, or figure more or less prominently, such as the new public-house opposite the Fleet, the “Fox Under the Hill,” Sarjeants’ Inn Coffee House, the public-house, opposite the Insolvent Debtors’ Court, the Horn Coffee House in the Doctors’ Commons and the “Spaniards,” Hampstead Heath. Of these the “Fox Under the Hill,” casually referred to by Mr. Roker as the spot where Tom Martin “whopped the coach-heaver,” was situated on the Thames water-side in the Adelphi, at the bottom of Ivy Lane. The incident he related was no doubt a recollection of Dickens’s early days in the blacking factory at Hungerford Stairs, for the public-house was known to him, as the following sentence in his biography shows — “One of his favourite realities was a little public-house by the water-side called the ‘Fox Under the Hill,’ approached by an underground passage which we once missed on looking for it together”; and he had a vision which he has mentioned in Copperfield of sitting eating something on a bench outside, one fine evening, and looking at some coal-heavers dancing before the house.

The public-house, nevertheless, was there when Dickens and his biographer were seeking it, for it was not demolished until the Victoria Embankment was built many years later.

Robert Allbut states that the “Fox Under the Hill” was the tavern where Martin Chuzzlewit, junior, was accommodated when he arrived in London, and where he was visited by Mark Tapley.

[illustration: The “Fox Under the Hill”]

The public-house opposite the Insolvent Debtors’ Court, where Mr. Weller consulted Mr. Solomon Pell on an urgent family matter, was no doubt the “Horse and Groom” that once stood in Portugal Street, covered now by the solid buildings of Messrs. W. H. Smith and Sons, of railway bookstall fame. It was here Sam obliged the company with his song on "Bold Turpin," whilst his father and Solomon Pell went to swear the affidavit for Sam's arrest. It was also at this identical public-house that Mr. Solomon Pell, later on in the book, was engaged to undertake the details of proving the Will of the late Mrs. Weller, and where, "to celebrate Mr. Weller coming into possession of his property," a little lunch was given to his friends, comprising porter, cold beef and oysters, to which ample justice was done.

Reverting to the former incident, the elder Weller and Solomon Pell duly returned with the document all complete, and the party sallied forth to the Fleet Prison. On their way they stopped at Sarjeants' Inn Coffee House off Fleet Street to refresh themselves once more. When Sarjeants' Inn was rebuilt in 1838 the coffee house referred to ended its existence.

The Horn Coffee House in Doctors' Commons, to which a messenger was despatched from the Fleet Prison for "a bottle or two of very good wine" to celebrate Mr. Winkle's visit to his old friend, was a well-known and frequented place of call at the time. It was situated actually in Carter Lane, and although the present house is more in keeping with modern methods, there still remains a portion of the old building.

The "Spaniards," Hampstead Heath, figures more prominently in the book than any of the foregoing, and has a story of its own to tell. In recalling the scene in its history which associates it with The Pickwick Papers, we remember that Mrs. Bardell and her friends, Mrs. Sanders, Mrs. Cluppins, Mr. and Mrs. Raddle, Mrs. Rogers and Master Tommy Bardell, bent on having a day out, had taken the Hampstead Stage to the "Spaniards" Tea Gardens, "where the luckless Mr. Raddle's very first act nearly occasioned his good lady a relapse, it being neither more or less than to order tea for seven; whereas (as the ladies one and all remarked) what could have been easier than for Tommy to have drank out of any lady's cup, or everybody's, if that was all, when the waiter wasn't looking, which would have saved one head of tea, and the tea just as good!"

But the brilliant suggestion was made too late, for "the tea-tray came with seven cups and saucers, and bread and butter on the same scale. Mrs. Bardell was unanimously voted into the chair, and Mrs. Rogers being stationed on her right hand and Mrs. Raddle on her left, the meal proceeded with great merriment and success," until Mr. Raddle again put his foot into it by making an unfortunate remark which upset Mrs. Bardell and caused him to be summarily sent to a table by himself to finish his tea alone.

Mrs. Bardell had just recovered from her fainting fit when the ladies observed a hackney coach stop at the garden gate. Out of it stepped Mr. Jackson of Dodson and Fogg, who, coming up to the party, informed Mrs. Bardell that his “people” required her presence in the city directly on very important and pressing business. “How very strange,” said Mrs. Bardell, with an air of being someone of distinction, as she allowed herself to be taken along, accompanied by Mrs. Sanders, Mrs. Cluppins and Tommy. Entering the coach in waiting, to be driven, as they thought, to Dodson and Fogg’s, they were alas! sadly deceived, for shortly afterwards Mrs. Bardell was safely deposited in the Fleet Prison for not having paid those rascals their costs, and promptly fainted in “real downright earnest.”

What happened to the rest of the party at the “Spaniards” history does not relate. But the event which had promised to be such a happy one at the famous old inn was spoiled by those rascallions of lawyers, and we can only hope that Mr. Raddle made himself amiable with the two ladies left in his charge, and helped them to enjoy the remainder of the day in the pleasant rural and rustic spot.

The “Spaniards” is still a favourite resort of the pleasure-seeking pedestrian, and a halting-place for refreshment for pilgrims across the Heath. The arbours and rustic corners of its pleasant tea gardens still attract holiday-makers, as they attracted Mrs. Bardell and her friends on that day long since gone by.

[illustration: The “Spaniards,” Hampstead Heath. Drawn by L. Walker]

The inn itself is spacious and offers the comforts expected of an ancient hostelry. Dating back to about 1630 it occupies what was once the lodge entrance to the Bishop of London’s great rural park, whose old toll gate is still remaining. It is said by some to have derived its name through having been once inhabited by a family connected with the Spanish Embassy; and by others from its having been taken by a Spaniard who converted it into a house of refreshment and entertainment. Ultimately its gardens were improved and beautifully ornamented by one William Staples, similar to the gardens which flourished during this period in other parts of the metropolis. It has carried on its business of catering for all and sundry to the present day, but the ornate decorations and statuary have long disappeared.

The “Spaniards” is a Dick Turpin house, for, according to tradition, in its precincts the famous highwayman often hid from his pursuers. We are assured that in the out-house he found his favourite resting-place, which many a time on the late return of the marauder had served as his bedroom. The under-ground passages that led to the inn itself have been filled up, years ago. There were two doors attacked by unpleasant visitors, and a secret trap-door through which Turpin dived into the underground apartment, there to await the departure of the raging officers, or to betake himself to the inn, if that were clear of attack.

To such a fine Londoner as Dickens, who must have known it and his history thoroughly, it is a little surprising that it does not figure more prominently in his writings than it does. There is, indeed, one occasion when, it seems to us, he missed the opportunity of making it a picturesque and typical setting for a scene which his pen was more peculiarly suited than any other we know.

In Barnaby Rudge he gives us vivid pen pictures of the Gordon Rioters setting fire to houses in London, prominent amongst them being that of Lord Mansfield, and goes on to describe how they proceeded to the country seat of the great Chief Justice at Caen Wood, Hampstead, to treat it in a similar fashion. On arriving there the rioters were met by the military, stopped in their nefarious deed, turned tail and returned to London — all in accordance with the historical facts which it is well known the novelist gathered from an authoritative document. But he does not tell us how the rioters were thwarted in their contemplated act, due, so runs the story, to the foresight of the landlord of the “Spaniards.”

On their way to Lord Mansfield’s house the rioters had to pass the Spaniards Inn, and the landlord, having been made aware of their approach and mission, stood at his door to meet them and enticed them in to drink whilst he sent a messenger to the barracks for a detachment of Horse Guards. In the interim his cellars were thrown open to the excited rebels, hot with irresponsibility from the devastation they had already made in London. Here he left them to themselves surrounded by all they might require to slake their thirsty appetites. By the time they had appeased this thirst and were ready to continue their journey to Lord Mansfield’s house a few yards off, they discovered to their chagrin that their way was blocked by the arrival of a contingent of soldiers. And so in their wisdom they retraced their steps, as Dickens tells us, faster than they went.

Now the reason for this quick decision on the part of the rebels is passed over by Dickens, and the “Spaniards” is, in consequence, robbed of additional reflected glory, whilst the landlord is deprived of his place of immortality in the pages of Dickens’s book: the one book on the “No Popery” riots that counts to-day. He does not even mention the Spaniards Inn in Barnaby Rudge, although the rioters are, in its pages, brought to the inn door, from which point they are turned back, and the famous seat of Lord Mansfield remains, if tradition be reliable, thanks to the landlord of the inn.

CHAPTER XV

THE “BELL,” BERKELEY HEATH, THE “HOP POLE,” TEWKESBURY, AND THE “OLD ROYAL,” BIRMINGHAM

The chapter describing the Pickwickians' journey from the “Bush” Bristol to Birmingham, supplies incidents at four inns mentioned by name, and one that is not. The party comprising Mr. Pickwick and Mr. Benjamin Allen, Bob Sawyer and Sam Weller, sallied forth in a post-chaise. The two former seated themselves comfortably inside, whilst Bob Sawyer occupied a seat on the trunk on the top, and Sam settled himself in the dickey.

The two last-named were bent on making a merry day of it, and as soon as they were beyond the boundaries of Bristol they began their tricks by changing hats, taking liquid and substantial refreshments to the amusement of the passers-by, and the astonishment of Mr. Pickwick. But the journey need not be described here. Suffice it to say that the hilarious pair outside, come what may, meant to make a day of it. Their first stop, ostensibly to change horses, was at the “Bell,” Berkeley Heath, on the high road between Bristol and Gloucester.

“I say, we’re going to dine here, aren’t we?” said Bob, looking in at the window.

“Dine!” said Mr. Pickwick. “Why, we have only come nineteen miles, and have got eighty-seven and a half to go.”

“Just the reason why we should take something to enable us to bear up against the fatigue,” remonstrated Mr. Bob Sawyer.

“Oh, it’s quite impossible to dine at half-past eleven o’clock in the day,” replied Mr. Pickwick, looking at his watch.

“So it is,” rejoined Bob, “lunch is the very thing. Hallo, you sir! Lunch for three, directly, and keep the horses back for a quarter of an hour. Tell them to put everything they have cold, on the table, and some bottled ale, and let us taste your very best Madeira.” Issuing these orders with monstrous importance and bustle, Mr. Bob Sawyer at once hurried into the house to superintend the arrangements; in less than five minutes he returned and declared them to be excellent.

[illustration: The Bell Inn, Berkeley Heath. Drawn by C. G. Harper]

The quality of the lunch fully justified the eulogium which Bob had pronounced, and very great justice was done to it, not only by that gentleman, but by Mr. Ben Allen and Mr. Pickwick also. In the hands of the thirsty three, the bottled ale and the Madeira were promptly disposed of; and when (the horses being once more put to) they resumed their seats, with the case-bottle full of the best substitute for milk-punch that could be procured on so short a notice, the key-bugle sounded, and the red flag waved, without the slightest opposition on Mr. Pickwick's part.

The unpretentious roadside inn still exists to-day, unaltered since the above-mentioned memorable occasion. It cherishes its Dickensian association by curiously and oddly announcing on its signboard that: "Charles Dickens and Party lunched here 1827. B. C. Hooper."

It is within a mile of Berkeley Road Station on the Bristol Road, and about the same distance from the town of Berkeley. It lies back from the main road, and is a rambling old house and of good age. Although it has no more mention in the book than that given above, it is well known far and wide, nevertheless. As the Pickwickians did not stay there the inn is deprived of the privilege of showing a room in which the illustrious men slept, as is done in the case of other inns; but it has been recorded by one proprietor that travellers have called there for no other purpose than that of drinking Dickens's health in the snug parlour.

Continuing their journey the animated party reached in course of time the "Hop Pole" at Tewkesbury, where they stopped to dine; upon which occasion, we are assured, there was more bottled ale, with some more Madeira, and some port besides; and here the case-bottle was replenished for the fourth time. Under the influence of these combined stimulants, Mr. Pickwick and Mr. Ben Allen fell fast asleep for thirty miles, while Bob Sawyer and Sam Weller sang duets in the dickey.

The "Hop Pole" is still a flourishing country inn with the old-world flavour and atmosphere still clinging to it, where one is treated with the courtesy and welcome reminiscent of the old-time coaching days. Some modern "improvements" have been made in it, but its general appearance has not been tampered with, and it remains a veritable Dickens landmark of the town which the Tewkesbury Dickensians are proud of possessing. It is practically as it was in Pickwickian days, and the fact that Mr. Pickwick dined there is boldly announced at the side of the entrance, the porch of which did not however exist in those days.

From the “Hop Pole,” Tewkesbury, the lively quartette continued their journey to Birmingham in a high-spirited mood and reached that city after dark.

“The postboy was driving briskly through the open streets and past the handsome and well-lighted shops which intervene between the outskirts of the town and the Royal Hotel, before Mr. Pickwick had begun to consider the very difficult and delicate nature of the commission which had carried him thither.”

The difficulty and delicacy mentioned referred to the presence of Bob Sawyer and Ben Allen, whom Mr. Pickwick for certain reasons wished miles away, but he hoped to surmount them by making his interview with Mr. Winkle, senior, as brief as possible.

[illustration: The “Hop Pole,” Tewkesbury, as it was in Pickwickian days. Drawn by Arch. Webb]

As he comforted himself with these reflections the chaise stopped at the door of the “Old Royal,” and the visitors were shown to comfortable apartments. Mr. Pickwick immediately made enquiries of the waiter concerning the whereabouts of Mr. Winkle’s residence, who was one not easily to be got the better of, as the following dialogue will show:

“‘Close by, sir,’ said the waiter, ‘not above five hundred yards, sir. Mr. Winkle is a wharfinger, sir, at the canal, sir. Private residence is not — oh dear no, sir, not five hundred yards, sir.’ Here the waiter blew a candle out and made a feint of lighting it again, in order to afford Mr. Pickwick an opportunity of asking any further questions, if he felt so disposed.

“‘Take anything now, sir?’ said the waiter, lighting the candle in desperation at Mr. Pickwick’s silence. ‘Tea or coffee, sir? Dinner, sir?’

“‘Nothing now.’

“‘Very good, sir. Like to order supper, sir?’

“‘Not just now.’

“‘Very good, sir.’ Here he walked softly to the door, and then stopping short, turned round and said with great suavity:

“‘Shall I send the chambermaid, gentlemen?’

“‘You may if you please,’ replied Mr. Pickwick.

“‘If you please, sir.’

“‘Bring some soda water,’ said Bob Sawyer.

“‘Soda water, sir? Yes, sir.’ And with his mind apparently relieved from an overwhelming weight by having at last got an order for something, the waiter imperceptibly melted away. Waiters never walk or run. They have a peculiar and mysterious power of skimming out of rooms, which other mortals possess not.”

Eventually Mr. Pickwick and his friends arrived safely at the house of Mr. Winkle, and, having concluded the interview, all three returned to the hotel and went “silent and supperless to bed.”

The next day was a dreary and wet one, and, in contemplating the aspect from his bedroom window, Mr. Pickwick was attracted by a game cock in the stable yard, who, “deprived of every spark of his accustomed animation, balanced himself dismally on one leg in a corner.” Then Mr. Pickwick discovered “a donkey, moping with drooping head under the narrow roof of an outhouse, who appeared from his meditative and miserable countenance to be contemplating suicide.” In the breakfast-room there was very little conversation; even Mr. Bob Sawyer “felt the influence of the weather and the previous day’s excitement, and in his own expressive language, he was ‘floored.’ So was Mr. Ben Allen. So was Mr. Pickwick.”

[illustration: The Old Royal Hotel, Birmingham. Drawn by L. Walker]

The Pickwickians’ visit, therefore, to the Royal Hotel was not a very bright and lively one, but they endeavoured to make the best of it.

“In protracted expectation of the weather clearing up, the last evening paper from London was read and re-read with an intensity of interest only known in cases of extreme destitution; every inch of the carpet was walked over with similar perseverance, the windows were looked out of often enough to justify the imposition of an additional duty upon them, all kinds of topics of conversation were started, and failed; and at length Mr. Pickwick, when noon had arrived without a change for the better, rang the bell resolutely and ordered out the chaise.”

And so they started on their journey back in spite of the miserable ‘outlook, feeling it was “infinitely superior to being pent in a dull room, looking at dull rain dripping into a dull street.”

But Mr. Pickwick’s lack of enthusiasm over the hotel was not due to the hotel itself, but more on account of the weather. As a fact, it was a very important hotel in those days. Attached to it were large assembly and concert rooms, erected in 1772 by Tontine. It was known as THE Hotel, the distinctive appellation of “Royal” being prefixed in consequence of a visit of a member of the royal family who took up his residence there for a time.

This is the only occasion the hotel has mention in the works of Dickens, and although Mr. Pickwick and his friends had no reason for being pleased with their visit to Birmingham’s old inn, the reverse can be said of Dickens himself, for on more than one occasion he had pleasant associations of his stay there. The hotel has been rebuilt, but the picture shows it as it was in Mr. Pickwick’s day.

Dickens visited Birmingham some dozen times from 1840 to 1870, and on most of the early occasions it is believed he stayed at the Old Royal Hotel. On January 6, 1853, Dickens was presented with a silver “Iliad” salver and a diamond ring by the people of Birmingham in grateful acknowledgment of his “varied and well-applied talents.” After the presentation the company adjourned to the Old Royal Hotel (then Dee’s Hotel), where a banquet took place with the Mayor, Henry Hawkes, in the chair, and Peter Hollins, the sculptor, in the vice-chair.

The company numbered 218, and the event is notable as the occasion on which Dickens made a promise to give, in aid of the Birmingham and Midland Institute, his first public reading from his books.

“It would take about two hours,” he said, “with a pause of ten minutes about half-way through. There would be some novelty in the thing, as I have never done it in public, though I have in private, and (if I may say so) with great effect on the hearers.”

That was a notable event in Dickens’s life, for it is well known what followed from that initial public recital; and the place where the step was taken naturally becomes a landmark in his life; and so the Old Royal Hotel, Birmingham, if for no other reason, claims to be remembered as a notable and important one in Dickens annals.

CHAPTER XVI

COVENTRY, DUNCHUBCH, AND DAVENTRY INNS, AND THE “SARACEN’S HEAD,” TOWCESTER

Continuing their journey, the Pickwickians duly reached Coventry. The inn, however, where the post-chaise stopped to change horses is not mentioned by name, but may have been the Castle Hotel there; at any rate, the “Castle” has a Dickensian interest, for it was here that a public dinner was given to Dickens in December, 1858, when he was presented with a gold repeater watch of special construction as a mark of gratitude for his reading of the Christmas Carol, given a year previously in aid of the funds of the Coventry Institute. The hotel was, at the time the Pickwickians arrived there, a posting inn of repute. From Coventry Sam Weller beguiled the time with anecdotes until they reached Dunchurch, “where a dry postboy and fresh horses were procured”; the next stage was Daventry, and in neither case is the name of an inn mentioned or hinted at.

At the end of each stage it rained harder than ever, with the result that when they pulled up at the “Saracen’s Head,” Towcester, they were in a disconsolate state. Bob Sawyer’s apparel, we are told, “shone so with the wet that it might have been mistaken for a full suit of prepared oilskin.” In these circumstances, and on the recommendation of the wise Sam, the party decided to stop the night.

“There’s beds here, sir,” Sam assured his master as a further inducement; “everything clean and comfortable. Very good little dinner, sir, they can get ready in half an hour—pair of fowls, sir, and a weal cutlet; French beans, ‘taters, tart and tidiness. You’d better stop vere you are, sir, if I might recommend.” At this very moment the host appeared, and, having confirmed Sam’s statement, Mr. Pickwick decided to take the “advice” of his trusted servant, which caused the landlord to smile with delight.

[illustration: The Pomfret Anns (formerly the “Saracen’s Head”), Towcester. Drawn by C.G. Harp]

The pilgrim to Towcester to-day, searching for the sign of the “Saracen’s Head,” would find himself on a fruitless errand, for it was changed scores of years back to the Pomfret Arms. Indeed, it was so called at the time The Pickwick Papers were first published, having been altered in 1881 at the bidding of the new lord of the manor when he succeeded to the titles and estates.

But doubtless Dickens knew it in his newspaper reporting days, and described it from memory. In any case, he is historically correct in retaining the old name, for the period of his book is 1827-28. Beyond the change of name the hotel to-day is practically the same as it was in those early days, the only material alteration being the conversion of the kitchen into a bar-parlour and smoking-room, where the open chimney and corner seats have given place to more modern and ornate substitutes.

Situated in the main street this old posting house is a prominent feature. The exterior is typical of the period. It is a low, long-looking building with many windows, two stories high (unless the dormer windows in the old red-tiled roof be counted another), and is built of a light brownish sandstone brick, peculiar to the neighbourhood. There is a picturesque bow window on the ground floor to the left of the solid oak gateway leading into the coach yard, and over this hangs the swinging sign-board flanked on each side by two curious carved figures set in alcoves let into the wall; the whole general setting is a pleasant survival of the old-time days of the coaching era.

There always is an agreeable and comforting relief to the traveller when he at last arrives at the inn at his journey’s end, and that feeling will not be dispelled to-day when the old “Saracen’s Head” is reached. But to the Pickwickians, on the occasion of their visit, wet to the skin, tired, and sorely out at elbow with the raging element they had just driven through, the “Saracen’s Head” must have been a haven of delight indeed; and those few words of instructions from the landlord to make the room ready for them must have been cheerful to their ears, and the result, as described in the following paragraph, a joy to their hearts:

“The candles were brought, the fire was stirred up, and a fresh log of wood thrown on. In ten minutes’ time a waiter was laying the cloth for dinner, the curtains were drawn, the fire was blazing brightly, and everything looked (as everything always does in all decent English inns) as if the travellers had been expected and their comforts prepared for days beforehand.”

So in this cosy room they gathered, after they had sufficiently dried themselves, and eagerly waited for dinner to be served. To them suddenly reappeared Sam Weller, accompanied by no less a person than the notorious Mr. Pott of the Eatanswill Gazette — who, that worthy had discovered, was also staying in the hotel. He was on his way to the great Buff Ball, to be held at Birmingham the next evening. Needless to say, he was heartily welcomed and an agreement was made to club their dinners. Mr. Pott soon began to entertain the company with gossip about his mission and firebrand intentions, taking the opportunity of letting off some of his best abusive expletives at the expense of his rival paper, the Eatanswill Independent, and its editor.

Incidentally he extolled the genius of one of his staff, and revealed the great secret of how he “crammed” for an article on “Chinese Metaphysics” by turning up the two words in the encyclopaedia and combining his information. He was in the midst of enlivening the proceedings with extracts from his own lucubrations, when his great rival, whom he was abusing, drove up, unknown to him, and booked abed for himself at the same hotel. Mr. Slurk was also making for the great Buff Ball at Birmingham, and, having ordered some refreshment, retired to the kitchen (a custom in those days) to smoke and read in peace.

“Now some demon of discord,” writes Dickens, “flying over the ‘Saracen’s Head’ at the moment,” prompted Bob Sawyer to suggest to his friends that “it wouldn’t be a bad notion to have a cigar by the kitchen fire.” They all agreed that it was a good idea, and forth they went — only to find, to their surprise, Mr. Slurk there before them deep in the study of some newspaper. The rival editors both started at each other, and gradually showed symptoms of their ancient rivalry bubbling up, which, by slow but certain process, developed until it eventually precipitated them into a free fight with carpet bag and fire shovel as respective weapons.

The details of this fracas are too well known to need repetition here. Suffice to say that, when the fray was at its height, Mr. Pickwick felt it his duty to intervene, and called upon Sam Weller to part the combatants. This he dexterously did by pulling a meal sack over the head and shoulders of Mr. Pott and thus effectually stopping the conflict. The scene, it will be remembered, was depicted with much spirit by Phiz, the artist who illustrated the book. The rivals parted, peace once more reigned, and the company repaired to their respective beds. In the morning both Mr. Pott and Mr. Slurk were careful to continue their journey in separate coaches before the Pickwickians were stirring, whilst the spectators of the exciting scene went forward to London in their post-chaise a little later.

This incident is one of those that are best remembered in the book, and has made the “Saracen’s Head,” Towcester, a notable Pickwickian landmark. The old posting inn remains to-day as it was when the book was written, and if the kitchen — as such — is not on view any longer, the same room turned to other uses is there for the faithful disciple to meditate in and visualize the scene for himself; and no doubt he will find that the inn is as famous now for its “French beans, ‘taters, tarts and tidiness” as it used to be.

We would, however, suggest to the present owner that the words “formerly the ‘Saracen’s Head’ “should be added to those of the Pomfret Arms Hotel on the sign now hanging so gracefully over the pavement as a guide to the Dickens pilgrim seeking the Pickwickian landmark of the town.

CHAPTER XVII

“OSBORNE’S,” ADELPHI, AND TONY WELLER’S PUBLIC-HOUSE ON SHOOTER’S HILL

There is a singular and conspicuous interest attaching to Osborne’s Hotel in the Adelphi, for the almost pathetic reason that it was in one of its rooms that Mr. Pickwick first made the momentous announcement of his intention of abandoning his nomadic life of travel and adventure and settling down in “some quiet, pretty neighbourhood in the vicinity of London, “where he had taken a house which exactly suited his fancy. And so it may be said that within its four walls the Pickwick Club brought its activities to an end, for on Mr. Pickwick’s decision to retire from its ramifications, coupled with the fact that during his absence in the Fleet Prison it had suffered much from internal dissensions, its dissolution was imperative, and to use his own words with which he announced the fact to his friends on the occasion in question, “The Pickwick Club no longer exists.”

That was an historic pronouncement, and the room in which it was made naturally becomes a veritable landmark for Pickwickians; and a fitting mark of this distinction might well be made, by the fixing of a tablet on the walls of the historic building, which still stands practically as it was in those adventurous days. The event which first brought Mr. Pickwick and his friends to the hotel was a domestic one; but the occasion did not pass without an awkward adventure such as always dogged the footsteps of the Pickwickians.

Mr. Pickwick had just been released from the Fleet Prison and was at Mr. Perker’s office settling little details in connexion with Messrs. Dodson and Fogg, when his old friend Wardle turned up quite unexpectedly to seek the advice of the little lawyer on the situation which had arisen by his daughter Emily’s infatuation for Mr. Snodgrass. He had brought his daughter up from Dingley Dell and informed Mr. Pickwick that “she was at Osborne’s Hotel in the Adelphi at this moment, unless your enterprising friend has run away with her since I came out this morning.”

Mr. Perker made advice unnecessary, for he proved to both of them that they were quite delighted at the prospect. Mr. Wardle forthwith invited them to dine with him, and he sent the fat boy to "Osborne's" with the information that he and Mr. Pickwick would return together at five o'clock. Arriving at the hotel the fat boy went upstairs to execute his commission.

"He walked into the sitting-room without previously knocking at the door, and so beheld a gentleman with his arm clasping his young mistress's waist, sitting very lovingly by her side on a sofa, while Arabella and her pretty handmaid feigned to be absorbed in looking out of a window at the other end of the room. At sight of which phenomenon the fat boy uttered an interjection, the ladies a scream, and the gentleman an oath, almost simultaneously.

"Wretched creature, what do you want here?" said the gentleman, who it is needless to say was Mr. Snodgrass.

To this the fat boy, considerably terrified, briefly responded, "Missis."

"What do you want me for?" enquired Emily, turning her head aside, "you stupid creature."

"Master and Mr. Pickwick is a-going to dine here at five," replied the fat boy.

After being bribed by Snodgrass, Emily and Arabella, he was invited by Mary to dine with her downstairs, where he regaled himself on meat pie, steak, a dish of potatoes and a pot of porter. Here he attempted to make love to Mary, and, having failed, "ate a pound or so of steak with a sentimental countenance and fell fast asleep."

"There was so much to say upstairs, and there were so many plans to concert for elopement and matrimony in the event of old Wardle continuing to be cruel, that it wanted only half an hour to dinner when Mr. Snodgrass took his final adieu. The ladies ran to Emily's bedroom to dress, and the lover, taking up his hat, walked out of the room. He had scarcely got outside the door when he heard Wardle's voice talking loudly; and, looking over the banisters, beheld him, followed by some other gentlemen, coming straight upstairs. Knowing nothing of the house, Mr. Snodgrass in his confusion stepped hastily back into the room he had just quitted, and, passing from thence into an inner apartment (Mr. Wardle's bedchamber), closed the door softly, just as the persons he had caught sight of entered the sitting-room. These were Mr. Wardle and Mr. Pickwick, Mr. Nathaniel Winkle and Mr. Benjamin Allen, whom he had no difficulty in recognising by their voices."

In this dilemma Mr. Snodgrass remained, for the door was locked and the key gone, and in desperation he sat himself down upon a portmanteau and trembled violently. In the meantime Mr. Pickwick, Mr. Wardle and the rest of the company settled down to dinner, at which the fat boy made himself conspicuous “by smirking, grinning and winking with redoubled assiduity.” His state of mind grew worse, when, having at Mr. Wardle’s instructions, gone into the next room to fetch his snuff-box from the dressing-table, he returned with the palest face “that ever a fat boy wore.” In his effort to acquaint Mr. Pickwick with what he encountered in the room, his manner became worse and worse, and on the instant that Mr. Wardle was about to ring for the waiters to remove him to a place of safety, Mr. Snodgrass, “the captive lover, his face burning with confusion, suddenly walked in from the bedroom, and made a comprehensive bow to the company.”

“Mr. Snodgrass, who had only waited for a hearing, at once recounted how he had been placed in his then distressing predicament; how the fear of giving rise to domestic dissensions had alone prompted him to avoid Mr. Wardle on his entrance; and how he merely meant to depart by another door, but, finding it locked, had been compelled to stay against his will. It was a painful situation to be placed in; but he now regretted it the less, inasmuch as it afforded him an opportunity of acknowledging before their mutual friends that he loved Mr. Wardle’s daughter deeply and sincerely, that he was proud to avow that the feeling was mutual, and that if thousands of miles were placed between them, or oceans rolled their waters, he could never for an instant forget those happy days when first — et cetera, et cetera.

But he was stopped on the threshold, and Arabella, having taken up the defence, called on Mr. Wardle to “shake hands with him and order him some dinner.” A reconciliation took place and Mr. Snodgrass had dinner at a side-table, and when he had finished drew his chair next to Emily, without the smallest opposition on the old gentleman’s part. The remainder of the evening passed off very happily “and all was smiles and shirt collars.”

During the next few days much perturbation was evinced by the Pickwickians at their leader’s continual absence from the society of his admiring friends, and it being unanimously resolved that he should be called upon to explain himself, Mr. Wardle invited the “full circle” to dinner again at Osborne's Hotel to give him the opportunity. After the decanters "had been twice sent round" Mr. Wardle called upon Mr. Pickwick for his explanation. This was forthcoming in a pathetic speech, very affecting to all present, announcing his unalterable decision of retiring for the rest of his life into the quiet village of Dulwich. "If I have done but little good," he said, by way of peroration, "I trust I have done less harm, and that none of my adventures will be other than a source of amusing and pleasant recollection to me in the decline of life. God bless you all."

With these words Mr. Pickwick filled and drained a bumper with a trembling hand; and his eyes moistened as his friends rose with one accord and pledged him from their hearts. So runs the chronicle, and so ended the immortal Pickwick Club, in the precincts of Osborne's Hotel in the Adelphi, which also became the headquarters of the relatives of Mr. Wardle during their stay in London for the wedding of his daughter. From here the wedding party set out for Mr. Pickwick's new abode at Dulwich, from which house the ceremony took place, and where the wedding was celebrated by a happy breakfast party afterwards.

To have the distinction of being the venue for such notable events is something that any self-respecting hotel should be proud of, and we are sure that Osborne's Hotel will be remembered so long as it stands for those reasons alone. But it has other reasons for fame, even if they are more likely to be forgotten, or lightly passed over by those who keep the records of London's notable landmarks. It stands to-day in a neighbourhood distinguished for its history, and has claims to a share in the making of that history.

It is situated, as it has always been, at the corner of John and Adam Streets, and was first opened in 1777 as the Adelphi New Tavern and Coffee House. Dickens no doubt knew it well, for the Adelphi and its neighbourhood attracted him greatly, and its curious old buildings, side streets and rambling arches often figure in his books. When a mere boy at work in the blacking factory, down by the river there, he continually wandered about its quaint byways. "Osborne's" was a notable house in those days, and if its full records were available, no doubt many an entertaining story concerning its activities could be told. As it is, it is known that "being completely fitted up in the most elegant and convenient manner for the entertainment of noblemen and gentlemen,” as it boasted in its early days, many notable figures in past history made it their headquarters.

On the 8th August, 1787, Gibbon stayed there on his arrival from Lausanne with the completion of his “History,” and wrote to Lord Sheffield to apprise him of the fact. In 1802 Isaac D’Israeli, the author of Curiosities of Literature and father of the famous Earl of Beaconsfield, stayed in the hotel after his honeymoon. It is also on record that George Crabbe, the poet, with his wife resided for a time there, and that Rowlandson, the caricaturist, died in one of its rooms in 1827.

Perhaps the most notorious of visitors to it were the King and Queen of the Sandwich Islands in 1824. Unfortunately, both were victims to the smallpox epidemic which raged at the time, and died in the hotel, the latter on the 8th July of that year and the former on the 14th September. The visit of the “illustrious” king, we are told, gave rise to the popular song, “The King of the Cannibal Islands.”

During the war it was acquired as a house of utility for the military. Before it was acquired for that purpose it was the favoured resort of business men of the neighbourhood and of certain literary and artistic coteries, and was the headquarters of the famous O.P. Club. However, it has returned now to its old-time ways and methods, and we hope it will long remain a landmark for the Dickens lover and particularly the Pickwickian devotee.

The last tavern mentioned in The Pickwick Papers is the “excellent public-house near Shooter’s Hill, “to which Mr. Weller, senior, retired. Unfortunately it was never named, nor has it been identified. Continuing to drive a coach for twelve months after the Pickwick Club had ceased to exist, he became afflicted with gout and was compelled to give up his lifelong calling. The contents of his pocket-book had been so well invested by Mr. Pickwick, we are told, that he had a handsome independence for the purpose of his last days. At Shooter’s Hill he was quite revered as an oracle, boasting very much of his intimacy with Mr. Pickwick, and retaining a most unconquerable aversion to widows.

CHAPTER XVIII

Certain traditional legends naturally grow round our old London landmarks and, when once started, no matter how conjectural, they are hard to overtake or suppress.

The George Inn, Southwark, is an instance of this, and the legend that is prone to cling to it is that it was the original of the White Hart Inn of Pickwick fame; the contention being that Dickens, when writing so faithfully of the “White Hart” in Chapter X of The Pickwick Papers, where Sam Weller was first discovered, described the “George” and called it after its near neighbour, the “White Hart.” This contention, we submit, has no justification whatever. The only reason, therefore, for referring to it here, is with a view to dispelling the illusion.

It is surprising that so good a Dickensian as the late J. Ashby Sterry should have been one of those who favoured the idea. Whether he was the first to do so we are not aware. But in his very interesting and informative article entitled “Dickens in Southwark,” in The English Illustrated Magazine for November, 1888, he states it as his opinion that the “George” was the original of the “White Hart,” and reverted to the same idea in The Bystander (1901). The following extract from the former article contains the argument he used to substantiate his claim:

“Moreover it (the ‘George’) is especially notable as being the spot where Mr. Pickwick first encountered the immortal Sam Weller. The ‘White Hart’ is the name, I am aware, given in the book, but it is said that Dickens changed the sign in order that the place should not be too closely identified. This was by no means an unusual custom with the novelist. I think he did the same thing in Edwin Drood, where the ‘Bull’ at Rochester is described under the sign of the ‘Blue Boar.’ A similar change was made in Great Expectations, where the same inn is disguised in like fashion, in the account of the dinner given after Pip was bound apprentice to Joe Gargery. The ‘White Hart’ is close by, on the same side of the way, a little nearer London Bridge, but little, if anything, is remaining of the old inn, and the whole of the place and its surroundings have been modernised.

“I, however, had the opportunity of comparing both inns some years ago, and have no hesitation in saying that the ‘George’ is the inn where the irrepressible Alfred Jingle and the elderly Miss Rachel were discovered by the warm-hearted, hot-tempered Wardle. If you like to go upstairs you can see the very room where Mr. Jingle consented to forfeit all claims to the lady’s hand for the consideration of a hundred and twenty pounds. Cannot you fancy, too, the landlord shouting instructions from those picturesque flower-decked galleries to Sam in the yard below?”

These deductions and views are not in any way convincing to us; indeed, we find ourselves in complete disagreement with them, and few Dickensians, we feel sure, will endorse them.

Mr. Ashby Sterry’s argument regarding the “Bull” and the “Blue Boar” at Rochester proves nothing. Dickens described the “Bull” there in The Pickwick Papers and called it the “Bull” at Rochester, as he did the “Leather Bottle” at Cobham, the “Angel” at Bury St. Edmunds, the “Great White Horse” at Ipswich — to name a few parallel cases. When he described the “Bull” and called it the “Blue Boar,” it was in another book, Great Expectations, not in Edwin Drood, as stated by Mr. Ashby Sterry, and its location was a fictitious city, i.e. The Market Town.

The only case in which Dickens deliberately used the name of one inn for another was that of the “Maypole” and “King’s Head” at Chigwell in Barnaby Rudge. But in this instance he admitted that he had done so, although it was scarcely necessary, for the inns were very dissimilar and the novelist’s description of the latter could not be taken for the former.

The case of the “George” and the “White Hart” is different. They both stood quite near to each other at the time Dickens was writing The Pickwick Papers, and were both so named and both famous. There could be no reason, therefore, for him to describe one and call it by the other’s name.

Although they may not have been identical in all particulars as to structure, the “George” and the “White Hart” were sufficiently alike to make it possible for a person of imagination to go over the “George” and be satisfied that such and such a room might do for the one in which “Mr. Jingle forfeited all claims to the lady’s hand,” and imagine, too, that the galleries could be accepted easily as those over which “the landlord shouted instructions to Sam in the Yard.” But these flights of fancy could be indulged in even in the New Inn, Gloucester, or any similar old coaching inn, if one so desired.

Mr. Percy FitzGerald, the greatest authority on The Pickwick Papers, is of the same opinion as ourselves on the point, and asks: “Why should notoriety be attached to the ‘White Hart,’ from which the ‘George’ was to be shielded?”

No, the “George” is a wonderfully alluring old inn, and for this reason Dickensians have a warm place in their hearts for it. But we have no hesitation in saying that it is not the original of the “White Hart” of Pickwick and Sam Weller fame.

Another distinguished writer, the American novelist and artist, F. Hopkinson Smith, in his book, Dickens’s London, fell into a similar blunder. Indeed, his book contains some glaring mistakes, owing, no doubt, to the fact, which he admits, that he gathered his information from any Tom, Dick or Harry he came in contact with during his wanderings. In describing his visit to the “George,” he found incidents from Pickwick to fit every nook and cranny in the building and quoted them with much conviction. But he quoted no facts, nor did he give any data to substantiate his statements. Someone told him it was the original of the “White Hart,” as they told him that the house named Dickens House in Lant Street was where Dickens once lived, irrespective of the fact that the actual house was demolished years before. Yet that satisfied him, he took no trouble to make further enquiries and then imagined the rest. In regard to the “George” he let his imagination run riot, dilated on this being Miss Wardle’s room, this being the room where the couple were discovered, and further states that Dickens made the inn a favourite one of his when a boy in Lant Street, and speaks of the seat he used to sit in. All of which is sheer nonsense.

Dickens may have known the George Inn in those early days, but being only a mere boy is not likely to have frequented it. Although in later years — those of Little Dorrit and the Uncommercial Traveller — it is quite likely he may have visited it. Indeed, Miss Murray, the present hostess, tells us he did. Her authority was Abraham Dawson, a well-known carman and carrier in days gone by, who was a nephew of W. S. Scholefield who owned the inn at the time. Dawson assured her that he frequently chatted with Dickens in the coffee-room.

Yet the only occasion, so far as we are aware, that the novelist actually mentions the inn is in Little Dorrit, Book I, Chapter XXII, where Maggy, speaking of Tip, says: “If he goes into the ‘George’ and writes a letter. . . .”

No, the George Inn is just a fine survival of old days — the old days of which Dickens wrote — and is similar, in many respects, to what the ‘White Hart’ used to be. As such Dickensians have a great affection for it, and there is no need to invent stories about it to justify their reverence.

Mr. A. St. John Adcock is another writer who steers clear of the confusion. In The Booklover’s London, after referring to the “White Hart,” he goes on to say: “If you step aside up George Yard, which is next to the ‘White Hart’ yard, you may see the old George Inn which, with its low ceilings, ancient rafters and old wooden galleries outside, closely resembles what the ‘White Hart’ used to be, and gives us an idea of the inn yards in which the strolling players of Shakespeare’s time used to set up their stages.”

Let us leave it at that and retain our regard for the old inn for what it is, rather than for what it is not.

A LITERARY HIGHWAY

By Walter Dexter

From: Book Lover: a Magazine of Book Lore V.5 No.1 January 1904 (p.39-45)

Of all the great highways in the United Kingdom, the road which runs from London into Dover, and is commonly called the Dover Road, is perhaps the most historic. But other great highways have their place in history also, and so the Dover Road is but an historic road among a number, be its historic importance ever so great. It is the literary interest centred in its seventy odd miles that singles it out from all the other great roads of the country and causes it to stand alone as the great literary highway.

Let us view the Dover Road, our literary highway, as in a mirror, and see what it reflects. It reflects Chaucer and his "nyne and twenty in a compaignye" trudging its dust en route for Canterbury and a Becket's shrine; it reflects those wonderful tales, told one to another, to beguile the tedium of a lengthy journey, which Chaucer, the father of English poetry, has bequeathed to us.

It reflects the father of English drama, Christopher Marlowe, a young man of but thirty years of age, trudging from his birthplace, Canterbury, to the metropolis. It reflects "Dr. Faustus," his truly great work; it reflects a tavern brawl at Deptford, in which his young and brilliant career was suddenly brought to an end. At Deptford, too, "dismal Deptford" of to-day, it reflects the days of good Queen Bess: the luxuries of Sayes Court, and a vision of Walter Scott's "Kenilworth." It reflects Byron and "Don Juan" on Shooter's Hill. It reflects Shakespeare and "King Lear" on the cliffs at Dover. It reflects Shakespeare and Gad's Hill, by Rochester, with the valiant Sir John Falstaff plotting to rob the coach. The scene changes: it is Gad's Hill still, and our mirror reflects a pale sickly lad, gazing with admiration at a great house standing back from the highway; it reflects that same lad, now a man, in the full time of his glory, writing a literature that will never die: a literature that has fascinated, and will still fascinate, millions of readers wherever books are read; it reflects an empty chair in the study — and our vision of Charles Dickens vanishes, and with it the literature of the literary highway.

So let us now in all reality take a literary pilgrimage along the Dover Road. Let us picture ourselves en route for Rochester in the company of Mr. Pickwick, and his three friends, and the loquacious Alfred Jingle. Over London Bridge we rumble and down into the Borough. Where are the literary landmarks of this almost classic spot? Gone! Every one of them gone! Where is the Tabard of old, that hostelry of Chaucer's day?

In Southwerk at the Tabard as I lay,
Redy to wenden on my pilgrimage
To Caunterbury, with ful devout corage,
At night was come into that hostelrie
Wei nyne and twenty in a compainye,

That toward Caunterbury wolden ryde.

Where is the "White Hart" of Dickens's days, the immortal spot where Sam Weller made his bow to a vast appreciative public? Where is the house in Lant Street where Bob Sawyer gave his memorable party? Where is the Marshalsea, with its tender recollections of Little Dorrit? Gone! all gone, in the great endeavor to make London a more healthy and more habitable spot! St. George's Church is left, and with it we have a few lingering recollections of the night of Little Dorrit's party, when she went to sleep in the vestry with one of the parish registers for a pillow, and of a happy day, years afterwards, when she descended the altar steps, the wife of Arthur Clennam.

London is not left behind until we have gained the country beyond Blackheath. We might search in vain for Salem House, or the haystack beneath which David Copperfield slept on the first night of his memorable tramp to his aunt's cottage on the cliffs at Dover; but these are not the only literary landmarks of the district.

Shooter's Hill has a lingering memory of Dickens, of the night when the Dover mail lumbered up it, bearing in it no less a person than Mr. Jarvis

Lorry. This was in the days of the highwayman, when, so we are informed in chapter two of “A Tale of Two Cities,” “the Dover mail was in its usual genial position that the guard suspected the passengers, the passengers suspected one another and the guard, they all suspected everybody else, and the coachman was sure of nothing but his horses; as to which cattle he could, with a clear conscience, have taken his oath on the two Testaments that they were not fit for the journey.”

A fine picture of this literary highway in the days of the coach has Dickens drawn for us in that chapter, for none save him knew how to put life and vigor into its dust and stones.

And so, like the Dover mail, we “lumber up” the hill, listening the while to the loquacious stranger whose lively anecdotes soon find a place in Mr. Pickwick’s notebook.

From Shooter’s Hill Don Juan obtained his first glimpse of London:

A mighty mass of brick and smoke, and shipping,
Dirty and dusky, but as wide as eye
Could reach, with here and there a sail just skipping
In sight, then lost amid the forestry
Of masts; a wilderness of steeples peeping
On tiptoe through their sea-coal canopy:
A huge, dim cupola, like a foolscap crown
On a fool’s head — and there is London Town!

“This hill is dangerous.” So runs the cyclist’s notice at the top. Don Juan found it dangerous too — though in a different sense.

The poet Bloomfield, in his “Rural Tales,” devotes one poem to this very hill, and mentions the curious Severndroog Castle, which is situated in the woods to the right, as

This far-seen monumental tower
Records the achievements of the brave
And Angria’s subjugated power,

Who plundered on the Eastern wave.

From this spot, until we reach Rochester, the road is chiefly associated with Dickens. Passing through Gravesend we soon reach the little village of Chalk, at the farther end of which we find a couple of pretty cottages standing at a corner where the road branches off to Shorne. Here Charles Dickens spent his honeymoon. When he lived at Gad's Hill in later years he would often pass this spot during his daily walk — for he was a prodigious walker and the Dover Road knew him well. Mr. E. L. Blanchard, himself of no mean literary fame, and at that time living at Rosherville, often walked in this direction, and in so doing often met with Dickens at the same spot. "This was," he informs us, "on the outskirts of the village of Chalk, where a picturesque lane branches off towards Shorne and Cobham. Here the brisk walk of Charles Dickens was always slackened, and he never failed to gaze meditatively for a few moments at the windows of a corner house on the southern side of the road, advantageously situated for commanding views of the river and the farstretching landscape beyond. It was in that house he had lived immediately after his marriage."

Chalk Church is a few yards farther on, and stands out romantically against the distant river. This would often be included in his walk, says Dickens's biographer, John Forster. "He would . . . return by Chalk Church, and stop always to have greeting with a comical old monk who, for some incomprehensible reason, sits carved in stone, cross-legged, with a jovial pot, over the porch of that sacred edifice."

It is a most curious carving, and supposed to be symbolical of an ancient merrymaking known as "Church Ales."

This portion of the Dover Road between Gravesend and Rochester is a rare place for tramps, and Dickens thus describes it, in this respect, in one of his "Uncommercial Traveller" papers:

"I have my eye upon a piece of Kentish road, bordered on either side by a wood, and having on one hand, between the road dust and the trees, a skirting patch of grass. Wild flowers grow in abundance on this spot, and it lies high and airy, with a distant river stealing steadily away to the ocean like a man's life. To gain the milestone here, which the moss, primroses, violets, bluebells, and wild roses would soon render illegible but for peering travellers pushing them aside with their sticks, you must come up a steep hill, come which way you may. So all the tramps, with carts or caravans — the Gipsy-tramp, the Show-tramp, the Cheap Jack — find it impossible to resist the temptations of the place, and all turn the horse loose when they come to it, and bell the pot. Bless the place, I love the ashes of the vagabond fires that have scorched the grass!”

Bless the place! Of course he did, for the steep hill which leads to “the magic ground” is none other than Gad’s Hill, and on top is Gad’s Hill Place.

Dickens came to live at Gad’s Hill Place in 1856, at the age of forty-four, but from his very earliest days he had conceived a wonderful attraction for the house. This receives authentication at the hands of Dickens himself, who, in a paper entitled “Travelling Abroad,” in passing down the Dover Road en route for Calais overtakes a vision of his former self. The story is a pretty one, and worth repeating here:

“So smooth was the old high-road, and so fresh were the horses, and so fast went I, that it was midway between Gravesend and Rochester, and the widening river was bearing the ships, white-sailed or blacksmoked, out to sea, when I noticed by the wayside a very queer small boy.

“‘Halloa!’ said I to the very queer small boy, ‘where do you live?’

“‘At Chatham,’ says he.

“‘What do you do there?’ says I.

“‘I go to school,’ says he.

“I took him up in a moment, and we went on. Presently the very queer small boy says, ‘This is Gadshill we are coming to, where Falstaff went out to rob those travellers and ran away.’

“‘You know something about Falstaff, eh?’ said I.

“‘All about him,’ said the very queer small boy. ‘I am old — I am nine — and I read all sorts of books. But do let us stop at the top of the hill, and look at the house there, if you please!’

“‘You admire that house?’ said I.

“‘Bless you, sir,’ said the very queer small boy, ‘when I was not more than half as old as nine it used to be a treat for me to be brought to look at it; and now I am nine I come by myself to look at it. And ever since I can recollect, my father, seeing me so fond of it, has often said to me, if you were to be very persevering and were to work hard, you might some day come to live in it. Though that’s impossible!’ said the very queer small boy, drawing a low breath, and now staring at the house out of the window with all his might.

“I was rather amazed to be told this by the very queer small boy, for that house happens to be my house, and I have reason to believe that what he said was true.”

Was ever man so attracted by a house as Dickens was by Gad’s Hill Place? Dickens loved his Kent, his Dover Road, and Rochester in particular. In almost all his novels this city of Rochester figures in one way or another; even before he came to Gad’s Hill Place he had written the immortal “Pickwick” and described the city more or less minutely in sundry other works. His thoughts always turned to the towns on the literary highway, and after he had taken up his abode at Gad’s Hill Place he gave us that charming picture of the district in “Great Expectations,” and in his last work the fascination of Rochester held him still.

Our first impressions of Rochester are thus admirably expressed by our friends on the coach:

“‘Magnificent ruin!’ said Mr. Augustus Snodgrass, with all the poetic fervor that distinguished him, when they came in sight of the fine old castle.

“‘Ah! fine place,’ said the stranger, ‘glorious pile, frowning walls, tottering arches, dark nooks, crumbling staircases; old cathedral too, earthy smell, pilgrims’ feet worn away the old steps, little Saxon doors; . . . fine place, old legends too, strange stories.’”

The “Bull Inn” is in the main thoroughfare, on the right-hand side. It is much the same as when the Pickwickians stayed there, and when Dickens himself slept there on various occasions. There is the ballroom still, with the little minstrels’ gallery, and a recollection about it of Alfred Jingle masquerading in Mr. Winkle’s dress-suit.

“Wright’s, next house,” which, according to Mr. Jingle, was “dear — very dear — half-a-crown in the bill if you look at the waiter — charge you more if you dine at a friend’s than they would if you had dined in the coffee-room,” is the “Crown,” at the foot of the bridge, which, in Dickens’s days was kept by one named Wright, and in its old form was the “Inn at Rochester,” forming the scene with the flea-bitten travellers in Shakespeare’s “Henry IV.”

Our connection with Rochester does not take us from the High Street which forms a part of the Dover Road. Page upon page could be written of the literary interest of Rochester, but I must refrain from making more than brief mention of a few of the most important items.

Rochester Bridge, upon which Mr. Pickwick ruminated one morning until he was interrupted by the dismal man, is not the same bridge as that which now spans the Medway. The old bridge was swept away by a storm some nine or ten years after Mr. Pickwick's visit. Dickens gave many names to Rochester. In "Edwin Drood" it is "Cloisterham"; in "Great Expectations" we find it simply as "the market town." In one short story it is "Great Winglebury," in another sketch "Dullborough." The projecting clock at the Corn Exchange is a notable feature of the High Street, and is several times mentioned in the above-mentioned works.

"The silent High Street of Rochester," he writes in "The Seven Poor Travellers,"

"is full of gables, with old beams and timbers carved into strange faces. It is oddly garnished with a queer old clock that projects over the pavement out of a grave red-brick building, as if Time carried on business there and hung out his sign."

Opposite the clock is the "Bull Inn," already referred to, and a little farther up the street towards Chatham is a white house of three gables, known as Watt's Charity, or, in Dickens's parlance, "The house of the seven poor travellers," as this charity, which provides accommodation for "six poor travellers not being rogues or proctors," formed the basis of one of Dickens's well-known Christmas stories. On the same side of the road is Eastgate House, lately restored, which as the Nuns' House figured as the school of Miss Twinkleton in "Edwin Drood." Opposite is a large gabled house — Mr. Sapsea's house; whilst near at hand is the Gate House, opening into the Cathedral Close. At this house Jasper lodged with the verger Tope, as all readers of "Edwin Drood" know full well.

Of no town, save London, did Dickens write so much; no town did he love more. Before we leave Dickens and Rochester behind us let us quote the last description he penned of the cathedral city; it was almost the last paragraph he ever wrote:

"A brilliant morning shines on the old city. Its antiquities and ruins are surpassingly beautiful, with the lusty ivy gleaming in the sun and the rich trees waving in the balmy air. Changes of glorious light from moving boughs, songs of birds, scents from gardens, woods, and fields — or rather from the one great garden of the whole cultivated island in its yielding time — penetrate into the cathedral, subdue its earthy odor, and preach the Resurrection and the Life."

We have left Mr. Pickwick and his friends at the “Bull “; the coach has gone on without us, and we needs must follow on foot in the wake of David Copperfield.

We pass through Chatham. It would indeed be hard to locate the spot where David pawned his “little weskit” to the man who, with his frightful “Goroo! Goroo!” bid him “go for fourpence,” and so we walk straight through the town, up the long hill, to Sittingbourne and Canterbury.

There is not much left along the roadside to remind us of the days when countless pilgrims, weary and footsore, must have tramped this highway. For a greater part of the way the road is uninteresting, until we reach Ospringe and Faversham, and begin the ascent of Boughton Hill.

The village of Boughton-under-Blee must be familiar to readers of Chaucer’s “Canterbury Tales,” for it was here that the Canon and the Yeoman overtook the pilgrims in such mad haste:

When that tolde was the lif of seinte Cecile
Er we had ridden fully five mile
At Boughton under Blee us gan atake
A man, that clothed was in clothes blake,
And undernethe he wered a white surplis.

Boughton Hill is a long hill, and by the time we reach the top we, like many of the pilgrims of old, must take a rest, and enjoy the delightful views spread out on either hand. As yet Canterbury, though not many miles distant, is not visible; but as we descend to Harbledown — Bob-up-and-down Chaucer called it, and a very “little town” it is!

Wist ye not where standeth a little town
Which that ycleped is Bob-up-and-down
Under the Blee in Caunterbury way?

— we obtain a fine view of the pinnacles of the Cathedral away in the distance. It was here that the pilgrims first caught sight of the “Angel Steeple” (replaced in 1495 by the present central tower) and fell on their knees, their pilgrimage being all but at an end.

We enter the city of Canterbury, not so tired as young David, we hope, into its “sunny street . . . dozing as it were in the hot light; and with the sight of its old houses and gateways, and the stately gray cathedral, with the rooks sailing round the towers.”

Mr. Wickfield lived somewhere in the High Street at “ a very old house bulging out over the road — a house with long low lattice windows bulging out still farther, and beams with carved heads on the ends, bulging out too,” but it would be idle to assign any special house as being the one occupied by Agnes’s father.

The Chequers of Hope, where Chaucer’s pilgrims stopped, was situated at the corner of Mercery Lane. Not much of the original building is left; indeed, the stone vaults beneath the present building are supposed to be all that remains of the “Chequers” of Chaucer’s days.

The literary history of the Dover Road at Canterbury does not end with Chaucer and Dickens. The Rev. Richard Harris Barham, the author of the immortal “ Ingoldsby Legends,” was born here in 1788, and his ancestral home was the village of Barham, from which the family took their name, only a few miles south of Canterbury, and near to “ Toppington Everard,” which figures so often in the legends.

Canterbury is to Barham what Rochester is to Dickens. Thus does Barham speak of his birthplace in “The Ghost”:

There stands a City — neither large nor small, —

Its air and situation sweet and pretty;

It matters very little — if at all — Whether its denizens are dull or witty;

Whether the ladies there are short or tall.

Brunettes or blondes, only, there stands a city!

Perhaps ‘tis also requisite to minute

That there’s a Castle and a Cobbler in it.

A Fair Cathedral, too, the story goes,

And kings and heroes lie entombed within her:

There pious Saints in marble pomp repose,

Whose shrines are worn by knees of many a sinner;

There, too, full many an Aldermanic nose
Roll'd its loud diapason after dinner;
And there stood high the holy sconce of Becket,
Till four assassins came from France to crack it.

The “dark entry” of the Cathedral has been made famous in the humorous legend of “Nell Cook,” who “bought some nasty doctor’s stuff and put it in a pie,” and so poisoned the canon and his niece, of whom she was jealous.

Leaving Canterbury for Dover, sixteen miles distant, the literary interest lies off the Dover Road proper. In fact it lies on either side, and we may well call this portion of the road the Ingoldsby road. To the right is the village of Barham, and the farmhouse known as Tappington, a picturesque little old house nestling in the valley, a house which hardly comes up to the expectations we had of it after reading the preface of the Legends and looking at the engravings of the house accompanying it.

To the left we have the road running to Margate — a road that savors of Smuggler Bill and Exciseman Gill (“The Smuggler’s Leap “), of “The Brothers of Birehington,” “Misadventures at Margate,” and other well-known pieces.

But we have no time to search out Tappington Everard, to visit the Reculvers, to look down into the Chalk Pit, or to visit “merry Margate”; our road is David Copperfield’s road, and with him we cross “the bare wide downs” and come at last to Dover.

Where Miss Betsy Trotwood lived is not to be stated with exactitude, but from Dickens’s description given of the little cottage on the heights it is said to be one of the houses now known as “Athol Terrace,” overlooking the bay.

Dickens gave a reading of his works at Dover, and afterwards said that “the audience with the greatest sense of humor is Dover,” and Dickens was not the least humorous of the writers of this great literary highway which ends at Dover.

EXTRACT FROM “A Book of Remembrance”

by Elizabeth Duane Gillespie, J.B. Lippincott, 1901, p.123-124

In 1865, through the changes which come to us all in this mortal life, I was left alone with my daughter, my niece, and nephew, but they were all children. Our pleasures were few, but my time was absorbed in the education of my girls. Our summers were spent in New England wherever my brother, Rev. Richard B. Duane, selected a spot. In the winter of 1867-1868 we had the great pleasure to listen to Charles Dickens's readings from his own works. This was a delight, for from the opening chapters of the “Pickwick Papers” his books had for me great interest and peculiar charm. His wit was so keen, his insight into human nature so clear, his charity for all so evident, and his pathos so easily understood by any one who had had sorrow, that I have found in his writings a sympathetic answer to my feelings, whatever might be the mood.

I had taken my seat for his readings long before he came to Philadelphia, and had listened to him with intense delight, but on the evening when he read the “Christmas Carol” I was completely absorbed. I think I never turned my eyes from his face while he read. The day after Mr. George W. Childs sent for me; but this that good and noble man often did, sometimes to offer me a helping hand in my work, sometimes to ask me to help him in his constant care of others. When I reached his office he told me that Mr. Dickens had asked him, after describing where I sat, who I was, and had added, “I never had a more attentive listener.” He then told Mr. Childs he would be very glad to see me in his dressing-room after the next reading. I said “Yes” gladly to this invitation, and thus emboldened I sent Mr. Dickens a boutonniere on the morning of his next reading, and had the following acknowledgment:

“Dear Madam: —

“Accept my cordial thanks for your kind note, and with them the assurance that I shall have great pleasure in wearing your flowers this evening.

“Faithfully yours always,

“Charles Dickens.

“Mrs. Gillespie.

“Philadelphia, Thursday, Thirtieth Jan’y, 1868.”

Together Mr. Childs and I went into the dressing-room and found Mr. Dickens very tired and very warm. His welcome was most hearty; he thanked me for being an attentive listener and asked me which reading I had liked best. I told him “The Christmas Carol,” and added, “I read that aloud to my mother when it was first published, and then told her I hoped I should later take a walk in heaven between Sydney Smith and Charles Dickens.” Mr. Dickens laughed heartily, and after a most interesting conversation we rose to leave him. He held my hand in his, and said, “Good-night; I shall not forget that walk in heaven, but remember, you will see the back buttons of my coat through my heavenly body.” I never heard him speak again, but hope he still remembers the walk which is to come.

A CHILD'S JOURNEY WITH DICKENS

by Kate Douglas Smith

A CHILD'S JOURNEY WITH DICKENS

WHEN I was a little girl (I always think that these words, in precisely this juxtaposition, are six of the most charming in the language) — when I was a little girl, I lived, between the ages of six and sixteen, in a small village in Maine. My sister and I had few playmates, but I cannot remember that we were ever dull, for dullness in a child, as in a grown person, means lack of dreams and visions, and those we had a-plenty. We were fortunate, too, in that our house was on the brink of one of the loveliest rivers in the world. When we clambered down the steep bank to the little cove that was just beneath our bedroom windows, we found ourselves facing a sheet of crystal water as quiet as a lake, a lake from the shores of which we could set any sort of adventure afloat; yet scarcely three hundred feet away was a roaring waterfall, — a baby Niagara, — which, after dashing over the dam in a magnificent tawny torrent, spent itself in a wild stream that made a path between rocky cliffs until it reached the sea, eight miles away. No child could be lonely who lived on the brink of such a river; and then we had, beside our studies and our country sports, our books, which were the dearest of all our friends. It is a long time ago, but I can see very clearly a certain set of black walnut book-shelves, hanging on the wall of the family sitting-room. There were other cases here and there through the house, but I read and re-read the particular volumes in this one from year to year, and a strange, motley collection they were, to be sure! On the top shelf were George Sand's "Teverino," "Typee,"  Undine," Longfellow's and Byron's " Poems," " The Arabian Nights," Bailey's " Festus," " The Lamplighter," "Scottish Chiefs," Thackeray's "Book of Snobs," "Ivanhoe," and the "Life of P. T. Barnum." This last volume, I may say, did not represent the literary inclinations of my parents, but had been given me on my birthday by a grateful neighbor for saving the life of a valuable Jersey calf tethered on the too steep slopes of our river bank. The "Life of Barnum" was the last book on the heterogeneous top shelf, and on the one next below were most of the novels of Charles Dickens, more eagerly devoured than all the rest, although no book in the case had escaped a second reading save Bailey's "Festus," a little of which went a very long way with us.

It seems to me that no child nowadays has time to love an author as the children and young people of that generation loved Dickens; nor do I think that any living author of to-day provokes love in exactly the same fashion. From our yellow dog, Pip, to the cat, the canary, the lamb, the cow, down to all the hens and cocks, almost every living thing was named, sooner or later, after one of Dickens's characters; while my favorite sled, painted in brown, with the title in brilliant red letters, was "The Artful Dodger." Why did we do it? We little creatures couldn't have suspected that "the democratic movement in literature had come to town," as Richard Whiteing says, nevertheless we responded to it vigorously, ardently, and swelled the hero's public.

For periodical literature we had in our household "Harper's Magazine" and "Littell's Living Age," but we never read newspapers, so that there was a moment of thrilling excitement when my mother, looking up from the "Portland Press," told us that Mr. Dickens was coming to America, and that he was even then sailing from England. I remember distinctly that I prayed for him fervently several times during the next week, that the voyage might be a safe one, and that even the pangs of seasickness might be spared so precious a personage. In due time we heard that he had arrived in New York, and had begun the series of readings from his books; then he came to Boston, which was still nearer, and then – day of unspeakable excitement! – we learned that he had been prevailed upon to give one reading in Portland, which was only sixteen miles away from our village.

It chanced that my mother was taking me to Charlestown, Massachusetts, to pay a visit to an uncle on the very day after the one appointed for the great event in Portland. She, therefore, planned to take me into town the night before, and to invite the cousin, at whose house we were to sleep, to attend the reading with her. I cannot throw a more brilliant light on the discipline of that period than to say that the subject of my attending the reading was never once mentioned. The price of tickets was supposed to be almost prohibitory. I cannot remember the exact sum; I only know that it was mentioned with bated breath in the village of Hollis, and that there was a general feeling in the community that any one who paid it would have to live down a reputation for riotous extravagance forever afterward. I neither wailed nor wept, nor made any attempt to set aside the parental decrees (which were anything but severe in our family), but if any martyr in Fox's "Book" ever suffered more poignant anguish than I, I am heartily sorry for him; yet my common sense assured me that a child could hardly hope to be taken on a week's junketing to Charlestown, and expect any other entertainment to be added to it for years to come. The definition of a "pleasure" in the State of Maine, county of York, village of Hollis, year of our Lord 1868, was something that could not reasonably occur too often without being cheapened.

The days, charged with suppressed excitement, flew by. I bade good-bye to my little sister, who was not to share my metropolitan experiences, and my mother and I embarked for Portland on the daily train that dashed hither and thither at the rate of about twelve miles an hour. When the august night and moment arrived, my mother and her cousin set out for the Place, and the moment they were out of sight I slipped out of the door and followed them, traversing quickly the three or four blocks that separated me from the old City Hall and the Preble House, where Dickens was stopping. I gazed at all the windows and all the entrances of both buildings without beholding any trace of my hero. I watched the throng of happy, excited, lucky people crowding their way into the hall, and went home in a chastened mood to bed, — a bed which, as soon as I got into it, was crowded with Little Nell and the Marchioness, Florence Dombey, Bella Wilfer, Susan Nipper, and Little Em'ly.

There were other dreams, too. Not only had my idol provided me with human friends, to love and laugh and weep over, but he had wrought his genius into things; so that, waking or sleeping, every bunch of holly or mistletoe, every plum pudding was alive; every crutch breathed of Tiny Tim; every cricket and every singing, steaming kettle had a soul.

The next morning we started on our railroad journey, which I remember as one being full of excitement from the beginning, for both men and women were discussing the newspapers with extraordinary interest, the day before having been the one on which the President of the United States had been formally impeached. When the train stopped for two or three minutes at North Berwick, the people on the side of the car next the station suddenly arose and looked eagerly out at some object of apparent interest. I was not, at any age, a person to sit still in her seat when others were looking out of windows, and my small nose was quickly flattened against one of the panes. There on the platform stood the Adored One! His hands were plunged deep in his pockets (a favorite gesture), but presently one was removed to wave away laughingly a piece of the famous Berwick sponge cake, offered him by Mr. Osgood, of Boston, his travelling companion and friend.

I knew him at once! — the smiling, genial, mobile face, rather highly colored, the brilliant eyes, the watch chain, the red carnation in the button-hole, and the expressive hands, much given to gesture. It was only a momentary view, for the train started, and Dickens vanished, to resume his place in the car next to ours, where he had been, had I known it, ever since we left Portland.

When my mother was again occupied with her book, I slipped away and entered the next car. I took a humble, unoccupied seat near the end, close by the much patronized tank of (unsterilized) drinking-water, and the train-boy's basket of popcorn balls and molasses candy, and gazed steadily at the famous man, who was chatting busily with Mr. Osgood. I remembered gratefully that my mother had taken the old ribbons off my gray velvet hat and tied me down with blue under the chin, and I thought, if Dickens should happen to rest his eye upon me, that he could hardly fail to be pleased with the effect of the blue ribbon that went under my collar and held a very small squirrel muff in place. Unfortunately, however, his eye never did meet mine, but some family friends espied me, and sent me to ask my mother to come in and sit with them. I brought her back, and fortunately there was not room enough for me with the party, so I gladly resumed my modest seat by the popcorn boy, where I could watch Dickens, quite unnoticed. There is an Indian myth which relates that when the gaze of the Siva rested for the first time on Tellatonea, the most beautiful of women, his desire to see her was so great that his body became all eyes. Such a transformation, I fear, was perilously near to being my fate! Half an hour passed, perhaps, and one gentleman after another came from here or there to exchange a word of greeting with the famous novelist, so that he was never for a moment alone, thereby inciting in my breast my first, and about my last, experience of the passion of jealousy. Suddenly, however, Mr. Osgood arose, and with an apology went into the smoking-car. I never knew how it happened; I had no plan, no preparation, no intention, no provocation; but invisible ropes pulled me out of my seat, and, speeding up the aisle, I planted myself timorously down, an unbidden guest, in the seat of honor. I had a moment to recover my equanimity, for Dickens was looking out of the window, but he turned in a moment, and said with justifiable surprise: —

“God bless my soul, where did you come from?”

“I came from Hollis, Maine,” I stammered,” and I ‘m going to Charlestown to visit my uncle. My mother and her cousin went to your reading last night, but, of course, three couldn’t go from the same family, so I stayed at home. Nora, that’s my little sister, stayed at home too. She’s too small to go on a journey, but she wanted to go to the reading dreadfully. There was a lady there who had never heard of Betsey Trotwood, and had only read two of your books!”

“Well, upon my word!” he said; “you do not mean to say that you have read them!”

“Of course I have,” I replied; “every one of them but the two that we are going to buy in Boston, and some of them six times.”

“Bless my soul!” he ejaculated again. “Those long thick books, and you such a slip of a thing.”

“Of course,” I explained conscientiously, “I do skip some of the very dull parts once in a while; not the short dull parts, but the long ones.”

He laughed heartily. “Now, that is something that I hear very little about,” he said. “I distinctly want to learn more about those very dull parts.” And whether to amuse himself, or to amuse me, I do not know, he took out a notebook and pencil from his pocket and proceeded to give me an exhausting and exhaustive examination on this subject; the books in which the dull parts predominated; and the characters and subjects which principally produced them. He chuckled so constantly during this operation that I could hardly help believing myself extraordinarily agreeable, so I continued dealing these infant blows, under the delusion that I was flinging him bouquets.

It was not long before one of my hands was in his, and his arm around my waist, while we talked of many things. They say, I believe, that his hands were “undistinguished” in shape, and that he wore too many rings. Well, those criticisms must come from persons who never felt the warmth of his handclasp! For my part, I am glad that Pullman chair cars had not come into fashion, else I should never have experienced the delicious joy of snuggling up to Genius, and of being distinctly encouraged in the attitude.

I wish I could recall still more of his conversation, but I was too happy, too exhilarated, and too inexperienced to take conscious notes of the interview. I remember feeling that I had never known anybody so well and so intimately, and that I talked with him as one talks under cover of darkness or before the flickering light of a fire. It seems to me, as I look back now, and remember how the little soul of me came out and sat in the sunshine of his presence, that I must have had some premonition that the child, who would come to be one of the least of writers, was then talking with one of the greatest; — talking, too, of the author's profession and high calling. All the little details of the meeting stand out as clearly as though it had happened yesterday. I can see every article of his clothing and of my own; the other passengers in the car; the landscape through the window, and above all the face of Dickens, deeply lined, with sparkling eyes and an amused, waggish smile that curled the corners of his mouth under his grizzled moustache. A part of our conversation was given to a Boston newspaper next day, by the author himself, or by Mr. Osgood, and a little more was added a few years after by an old lady who sat in the next seat to us. (The pronoun "us" seems ridiculously intimate, but I have no doubt I used it, quite unabashed, at that date.)

"What book of mine do you like best?" Dickens asked, I remember; and I answered,

"Oh, I like David Copperfield much the best. That is the one I have read six times."

"Six times, — good, good!" he replied; "I am glad that you like Davy, so do I; — I like it best, too!" clapping his hands; and that was the only remark he made which attracted the attention of the other passengers, who looked in our direction now and then, I have been told, smiling at the interview, but preserving its privacy with the utmost friendliness.

"Of course," I added, I almost said 'Great Expectations,' because that comes next. We named our little yellow dog Mr. Pip. They told father he was part rat terrier, and we were all so pleased. Then one day father showed him a trap with a mouse in it. The mouse wiggled its tail just a little, and Pip was so frightened that he ran under the barn and stayed the rest of the day. Then all the neighbors made fun of him, and you can think how Nora and I love him when he's had such a hard time, just like Pip in 'Great Expectations'!"

Here again my new friend's mirth was delightful to behold, so much so that my embarrassed mother, who had been watching me for half an hour, almost made up her mind to drag me away before the very eyes of our fellow passengers. I had never been thought an amusing child in the family circle; what then, could I be saying to the most distinguished and popular author in the universe?

"We have another dog," I went on, "and his name is Mr. Pocket. We were playing with Pip, who is a smooth dog, one day, when a shaggy dog came along that didn't belong to anybody, and hadn't any home. He liked Pip and Pip liked him, so we kept him, and named him Pocket after Pip's friend. The real Mr. Pip and Mr. Pocket met first in Miss Havisham's garden, and they had such a funny fight it always makes father laugh till he can't read! Then they became great friends. Perhaps you remember Mr. Pip and Mr. Pocket?" And Dickens thought he did, which, perhaps, is not strange, considering that he was the author of their respective beings. Mr. Harry Furniss declares that "Great Expectations" was Dickens's favorite novel, but I can only say that to me he avowed his special fondness for "David Copperfield."

"Did you want to go to my reading very much?" was another question. Here was a subject that had never once been touched upon in all the past days, — a topic that stirred the very depths of my disappointment and sorrow, fairly choking me, and making my lip tremble by its unexpectedness, as I faltered, "Yes; more than tongue can tell"

I looked up a second later, when I was sure that the tears in my eyes were not going to fall, and to my astonishment saw that Dickens's eyes were in precisely the same state of moisture. That was a never-to-be-forgotten moment, although I was too young to appreciate the full significance of it.

"Do you cry when you read out loud?" I asked curiously. "We all do in our family. And we never read about Tiny Tim, or about Steerforth when his body is washed up on the beach, on Saturday nights, or our eyes are too swollen to go to Sunday School."

"Yes, I cry when I read about Steerforth," he answered quietly, and I felt no astonishment.

"We cry the worst when it says, 'All the men who carried him had known him and gone sailing with him, and seen him merry and bold,'" I said, growing very tearful in reminiscence.

We were now fast approaching our destination, — the station in Boston, — and the passengers began to collect their wraps and bundles. Mr. Osgood had two or three times made his appearance, but had been waved away with a smile by Dickens, — a smile that seemed to say, — “You will excuse me, I know, but this child has the right of way.”

“You are not travelling alone?” he asked, as he arose to put on his overcoat.

“Oh, no,” I answered, coming down to earth for the first time since I had taken my seat beside him, — “oh, no, I had a mother, but I forgot all about her.” Whereupon he said, — ” You are a passed-mistress of the art of flattery!” But this remark was told me years afterwards by the old lady who was sitting in the next seat, and who overheard as much of the conversation as she possibly could, so she informed me.

Dickens took me back to the forgotten mother, and introduced himself, and I, still clinging to his hand, left the car and walked with him down the platform until he disappeared in the carriage with Mr. Osgood, leaving me with the feeling that I must continue my existence somehow in a dull and dreary world.

That was my last glimpse of him, but pictures made in childhood are painted in bright hues, and this one has never faded. The child of to-day would hardly be able to establish so instantaneous a friendship. She would have heard of celebrity hunters and autograph collectors and be self-conscious, while I followed the dictates of my countrified little heart, and scraped acquaintance confidently with the magician who had glorified my childhood by his art.

He had his literary weaknesses, Charles Dickens, but they were all dear, big, attractive ones, virtues grown a bit wild and rank. Somehow when you put him — with his elemental humor, his inexhaustible vitality, his humanity, sympathy, and pity — beside the Impeccables, he always looms large! Just for a moment, when the heart overpowers the reason, he even makes the flawless ones look a little faded and colorless!

CHARLES DICKENS AND ROCHESTER.

Writing to the Hon. Mrs. Watson in 1856, Charles Dickens says: —

“I have always observed within my experience that the men who have left home young have, many long years afterwards, had the tenderest love for it. That’s a pleasant thing to think of, as one of the wise adjustments of this life of ours.”

It has no doubt been observed by all careful readers of the works of Charles Dickens how very frequently in his earliest and his latest books he introduces the city of Rochester as the scene of portions of his stories.

I now propose to bring together such references to this locality as are to be found in the entire works of Dickens, and where possible, to let the great master himself do the descriptive part in his own language.

In adding some explanatory notes of my own, I may say that, having passed perhaps the most impressionable part of my childhood at a school in Rochester, and having been familiar with the neighbourhood all through my life, I am able to testify to the wonderful accuracy and realism of the many sketches of life and scene in that part of Kent, which are to be found in some of the works of Charles Dickens.

Though not a man of Kent by birth, Charles Dickens was at the tender age of four years removed with his father's family to Chatham, where they lived near the parish church of St. Mary. Forster truly says that "the associations that were around him when he died were those which, at the outset of his life, had affected him most strongly."

He was, we are told, a very small boy for his age, and very delicate, insomuch that he could not engage in the ordinary sports of boys, but sat apart and watched them at their play, or read such works of Defoe, Smollett, Fielding, and Goldsmith as he had / access to.

All this and a great deal more we have from his own sketch of his early days in David Copperfield. When a very little fellow he had made several attempts at dramatic writing, or, as he says in his preface to a later edition of the Sketches by Boz, "They (the sketches) comprise my first attempts at authorship — with the exception of certain tragedies achieved at the mature age of eight or ten, and represented with great applause to overflowing nurseries." He had already become famous in his own childish circle as a good teller of a story, and an especially good singer of comic songs. Writing to Wilkie Collins in 1856, in answer to some enquiries as to his early years, he says: "I had been a writer when I was a mere baby, and always an actor from the same age."

That his childhood at this time was a happy, innocent enjoyment of life, is certain. We can gather this from some of his autobiographical characters, for we may now be quite sure that besides David Copperfield, Pip in Great Expectations, little Paul Dombey, and to some extent little Oliver Twist, there are other children, boys and girls too, here and there in his writings, who more or less reflect his own quaintly beautiful child-life. During the last two years of his residence at Chatham he was sent to school to a Mr. William Giles, in Clover Lane, or Clover Street as it is now. Here, too, he distinguished himself by his happy way of reciting pieces, and once obtained a double encore for a piece out of the Humourist's Miscellany called "Dr. Bolus." Mr. Giles appears to have had a very early and pronounced opinion of the sterling abilities of his little scholar, and it will, perhaps, be remembered that when about half the parts of Pickwick had been published, he, Mr. Giles, sent Dickens a silver snuff box with this inscription: "To the inimitable Boz;" and accordingly, he was known among his more intimate friends as "the inimitable" for the rest of his life.

The school of Mr. Giles is still remembered by many middle-aged people in these towns, as is also a schoolboy's doggerel rhyme which embraces the four principal schools of Rochester and Chatham of fifty years ago. It ran thus: —

Baker's Bull Dogs,

Giles's Cats,

New-road Scrubbers,

Troy-Town Rats.*

It was in the year 1821, at the age of nine years, that these I happy days of childhood were to terminate. "I have often heard him say," says Forster, "that in leaving the neighbourhood of Rochester he was leaving everything that had given his ailing little life its picturesqueness or sunshine. He was to be taken to London inside the stage coach, and Kentish woods and fields, Cobham Park and Hall, Rochester Cathedral and Castle, and all the wonderful romance together, including the red-cheeked baby he had been wildly in love with, were to vanish like a dream." Arrived in London we find the bright, genial, tender-hearted boy falling into utter poverty and neglect; his father was in difficulties, and soon afterwards was removed to the Marshalsea Prison, and the boy Dickens was sent to do the veriest drudgery at a blacking manufactory at Hungerford Stairs. What such a boy must have suffered in his neglect it would be difficult to estimate. He was not only getting no book-learning whatever, but he was fast losing what little he had learned at Chatham. He was not even properly fed, and had to associate with very different people to those he had been used to in Kent.

The subject of his neglect at this time was so painful to him that for twenty-five years afterwards he could not bring himself to mention it, even to his dearest friends. I find, however, that he mentions the blacking manufactory incidentally in two of his works. In the Pickwick Papers, chap, xxxiii., Mr. Weller, senior,

* The Troy-Town School at the top of Star-Hill was kept for many years by Mr. Geo. E. Shirley. The origin of the term “Scrubbers” is rather obscure.

"JASPER'S GATEHOUSE"
From "Edgar's Dream"

says: “Poetry’s unnat’ral; no man ever talked poetry ‘cept a beadle on boxin’ day, or Warren’s blackin’, or Rowland’s oil, or some o’ them low fellows.” In Great expectations, chap, xxvii., in answer to a question as to whether he had seen London yet, Joe Gargery, the blacksmith, replies: “Why, yes, sir, me and Wopsle went off straight to look at the blackin’ ware’us — but we didn’t find that it come up to its likeness in the red bills at the shop doors; which I meanersay,” added Joe, in an explanatory manner, “as it is there drawed too architectooralooral.”

For a full account of the almost incredible hardships and neglect that Dickens experienced at this time, see David Copperfield. The only difference in the actual sordid drudgery he was put to is that in the novel he makes a wine and spirit warehouse pass for the blacking manufactory. I will merely quote here the last paragraph of the dismal story. “I know that I lounged about the streets, insufficiently and unsatisfactorily fed — I know that, but for the mercy of God, I might easily have been, for any care that was taken of me, a little robber or a little vagabond.”

After another brief period of schooling, Charles Dickens went, at the age of fifteen, to a solicitor’s office, as junior clerk or officeboy, for that was what he really was; and after being there some eighteen months he, by the force of his own strong will, set himself to master the difficulties of stenography, and to qualify himself to take a situation as a reporter. Having succeeded in this in no ordinary degree, and having been in the gallery of the House of Commons for some years as a parliamentary reporter, Dickens suddenly startled the reading world of 1834 and 1835 by his Sketches by Boz which first appeared in the Monthly Magazine, and afterwards in the Evening Chronicle.

From this time there was for him really no looking back, either in popularity or fortune, and his first book, the Pickwick Papers, went up in circulation from four hundred copies of part i. to forty thousand of part xv., and this, says Forster, “without newspaper notice or puffing, until people at this time talked of nothing else, tradesmen recommended their goods by using its name, and its sale, outstripping at a bound all the most famous books of the century, had reached to an almost fabulous number.”

Writing at this time on the wonderful popularity, of Pickwick, Thomas Carlyle says —

An archdeacon with his own venerable lips repeated to me, the other night, a strange profane story of a solemn clergyman who had been administering ghostly consolation to a sick person; having finished, satisfactorily as he thought, and got out of the room, he heard the sick man ejaculate: “Well, thank God, Pickwick will be out in ten days any way.”

Having thus very briefly sketched an outline of the childhood and youth of Charles Dickens, I will now enter upon the more immediate subject in hand, and it will perhaps be better to take the works containing references to Rochester (which of course includes Chatham) in the order in which they appeared; and here I may say that the very beautiful drawings of my friend, the late William Hull, show Rochester not only as it now is, but as it was when Dickens was a child. Changes have taken place in the old city during the last half century, and notably the old bridge has been replaced by a new one; but the views of Rochester here shown by Mr. Hull, and which he truly said he took up at my invitation as a labour of love, are most of them substantially the same as they must have appeared to William Hogarth and his four jovial friends, when they visited Rochester during their memorable “Five days peregrination” in May, 1732! It is very probable that had Charles Dickens lived to complete Edwin Drood, some of the illustrations would have included views of places now before you. From the volumes of Dickens’s Letters we learn that at the end of the very week in which Dickens died, Mr. Fildes was to have been introduced to Rochester and neighbourhood, with a view to future illustrations. In the woodcut opposite page 88 of the unfinished story, we have a view taken opposite the west door of the cathedral, and which shows part of the cathedral graveyard, part of St. Nicholas’ Parish Church, and the Gatehouse. This was evidently taken after Dickens’s death, and though the Gatehouse is shewn as a stone building to the top, instead of timber, it is still a wonderfully fine illustration, and serves to show what we have lost.

In “The Great Winglebury Duel,” one of the Sketches, occurs the first recognizable hint of Rochester, though it is of course not mentioned by name. It was nevertheless evidently in the mind of the writer when he penned the description of the High Street and the hotel.

At the opening of Pickwick we find the friends on their way to the Bull Hotel, Rochester, and a capital description is given of the old house, the ball-room and grand staircase of which remain to this day just as it appeared to Mr. Pickwick and his friends more than fifty years since, for the tale is laid in the year 1827. Standing on Rochester bridge early on a fine summer morning, Mr. Pickwick, beheld the landscape here described, and part of which I have attempted to show in a sketch at the head of this paper.

On the left of the spectator lay the ruined wall, broken in many places, and in some overhanging the narrow beach below in rude and heavy masses.

* * * Behind it rose the ancient castle, its towers roofless, and its massive walls crumbling away, but telling us proudly of its old might and strength

* * * On either side the banks of the Medway, covered with cornfields and pastures, with here and there a windmill or a distant church, stretched away as far as the eye could see, presenting a rich and varied landscape, rendered more beautiful by the changing shadows which passed swiftly across it, as the thin and half-formed clouds skimmed away in the light of the morning sun.

We next get a glimpse of the friends just issued from their hotel, on their way to Dingley Dell, Mr. Winkle’s horse “drifting up the High Street in the most mysterious manner — side first, with his head to one side of the way, and his tail towards the other.” Then there is an account of a review on Chatham Lines, wonderfully told, but too long to give here. An extract from Mr. Pickwick’s never-failing notebook runs thus: “The principal productions of these towns appear to be soldiers, sailors, Jews, chalk, shrimps, officers, and dock-yard men. The commodities chiefly exposed for sale in the public streets are marine stores, hard bake, apples, fiat fish, and oysters.”

Mr. Jingle, in describing the various grades of exclusiveness in these parts, says, for the enlightenment of Mr. Tupman, “The dock-yard people of upper rank don’t know dock-yard people of lower rank; – dock-yard people of lower rank don’t know small gentry – small gentry don’t know tradespeople; – commissioner don’t know anybody.”

It is worthy of notice, more particularly as it is not mentioned by Forster, that the scene of the duel which was to have been fought between Mr. Winkle, and the irascible Dr Slammer, is laid in the field at the back of Fort Pitt; the very spot where the four schools before-mentioned, used to meet to settle their difficulties with their fists!! Here too they occasionally met in the more friendly rivalry of Cricket. We do not find Rochester mentioned again till 1849, when David Copperfield passes through these towns on his way to Dover.

I see myself, as evening closes in, coming over the bridge at Rochester, footsore and tired, and eating bread that I had bought for supper. One or two little houses with the notice “Lodgings for travellers” hanging out had tempted me; but I was afraid of spending the few pence I had, and was even more afraid of the vicious looks of the trampers I had met or overtaken. I sought no shelter, therefore, but the sky, and toiling into Chatham — which in that night’s aspect is a mere dream of chalk and drawbridges, and mastless ships in a muddy river, roofed like Noah’s arks — crept at last upon a sort of grass-grown battery overhanging a lane, where a sentry was walking to and fro. There I lay down near a cannon, and, happy in the society of the sentry’s footsteps, slept soundly till morning.

He then tells how he had to sell his little jacket in order to buy food, and “Old Charley,” the dealer in second-hand clothes — a real character of forty years ago — is portrayed for all time. The description is too long for quotation, but here is the close of it: —

There never was such another drunken madman in that line of business, I hope. That he was well known in the neighbourhood, and enjoyed the reputation of having sold himself to the Devil, I soon understood from the visits he received from the boys who continually came skirmishing about the shop, shouting that legend and calling to him to bring out his gold.

There is another reference to this district in David Copperfield, where Mrs. Micawber explains her presence thus: —

Mr. Micawber was induced to think, on enquiry, that there might be an opening for a man of his talent in the Medway coal trade. Then, as Mr. Micawber very properly said, the first step to be taken was to come and see the Medway — which we came and saw. We came, repeated Mrs. Micawber, and saw I think the greater part of the Medway, and my opinion of the coal trade on that river is that it may require talent, but that it certainly requires capital. Talent, Mr. Micawber has; Capital, Mr. Micawber has not.

In 1854 we have as a Christmas tale The Seven Poor Travellers, the scene of which is laid in High Street, Rochester, at Watts's Charity. The well known Inscription over the door of Watts's Charity has puzzled many generations of men. It runs thus: —

Richard Watts, Esq.,
by his Will, dated 22 Aug., 1579, founded this Charity
for Six poor Travellers, who not being Rogues or Proctors, may receive gratis for one night,
Lodging, Entertainment, and Fourpence each.

WATTS'S CHARITY.

MINOR CANON ROW, ROCHESTER.

See The Seven Poor Travellers, and Edwin Drood.

ROCHESTER CATHEDRAL AND CASTLE.

This may have been well understood three hundred years ago, but, Time had drawn a veil over the true reading of the inscription, till quite lately, when Mr. W. Gibson Ward of Ross, pointed out, that the Proctors who are not to participate in the charity, were a set of mendicants, who swarmed everywhere in the South of England, under the pretence of collecting alms for the support of Leper-houses, at a time, too, when these Hospitals had fortunately become unnecessary.

In the time of Watts, these Proctors had become a greater nuisance than the Leprosy itself. Hence the prohibition.

Dickens under guise of a seventh poor Traveller, then gives a description of the Charity as administered in 1854.

I had been wandering about the neighbouring cathedral and had seen the tomb of Richard Watts, with the effigy of worthy Master Richard starting out of it like a ship's figure-head, and the way being very short and very plain, I had come prosperously to the inscription and the quaint old door.

I found it to be a clean white house, of a staid and venerable air, with choice little low lattice windows, and a roof of three gables. The silent High Street of Rochester is full of gables, with old beams and timbers carved into strange faces. It is oddly garnished with a queer old clock that projects over the pavement out of a grave red-brick building, as if time carried on business there and hung out his sign. Sooth to say, he did an active stroke of work in Rochester, in the days of the Romans, and the Saxons, and the Normans; and down to the times of King John, when the rugged castle — I will not undertake to say how many hundreds of years old then — was abandoned to the centuries of weather which had so defaced the dark apertures in its walls that the ruin looks as if the rooks and daws had picked its eyes out.

As I passed along the High Street I heard the waits at a distance, and struck off to find them. They were playing near one of the old gates of the city, at the corner of a wonderfully quaint row of red-brick tenements, which the clarionet obligingly informed me were inhabited by the minor canons. They had odd little porches over the doors, like sounding-boards over old pulpits; and I thought I should like to see one of the minor canons come out upon his top step and favour us with a little Christmas discourse about the poor scholars of Rochester, taking for his text the words of his Master relative to the devouring of widows' houses.

This refers to a great scandal, caused by the discovery of a serious misappropriation of the Rochester Cathedral funds by the clergy, and for the exposure of which the Rev. Robert Whiston, M. A., then Head Master of the Grammar School, had just before this date (November, 1854) been presented with a service of plate.

Mr. Whiston recovered for the school a large sum of money, amounting to many thousands of pounds, for which service he was promptly turned out of his Head Mastership by the Dean and Chapter. They were however compelled to re-instate him at once, and the foregoing allusion by Dickens was thought at the time to be well deserved, and not at all too strong.

In the Uncommercial Traveller, 1860, we have many glimpses of Rochester and its vicinity. The first is in a chapter on Tramps, which abound on the great Dover Road, and especially so in the neighbourhood of Gads Hill.*

As a tramping clock-maker the un-commercial traveller gives a good description of Cobham Hall and Woods. * * * Having in following his vocation given voice to the long silent bell of the stable-clock, the un-commercial is introduced to the hospitality of the servants' hall * * * "and there regaled with beef and bread, and powerful ale."

Then, paid freely, we should be at liberty to go, and should be told by a pointing helper to keep round over yinder by the blasted ash, * * * and so straight through the woods, till we should see the town-lights, right afore us. * * * Then should we make a burst to get clear of the trees, and should soon find ourselves in the open, with the town-lights bright ahead of us.

So should we lie that night at the ancient sign of the Crispin and Crispanus,+ and rise early next morning to be betimes on tramp again.

Farther on in this chapter on tramps, we have the surroundings of the third milestone from Rochester, on the road to Gravesend, lying a little to the West of Gads-hill Place, brought before our notice thus. * * * (The distant river is the Thames.)

I have my eye on a piece of Kentish road, bordered on either side by a wood, and having on one hand, between the road-dust and the trees, a skirting patch of grass. Wild flowers grow in abundance on this spot, and it lies high and airy, with a distant river stealing steadily away to the ocean, like a man's life. To gain the milestone here, which the moss, primroses, violets, blue bells, and wild roses would soon render illegible but for peering travellers pushing them aside with their sticks, you must come up a steep hill, come which way you may. So all the tramps with carts or caravans — the gipsy tramp, the show tramp, the Cheap Jack — find it impossible to resist the temptations of the place, and all turn the horse loose when they come to it, and boil the pot. Bless the place, I love the ashes of the vagabond fires that have scorched its grass! On this hallowed ground has it been my happy privilege (let me whisper it) to behold the white-haired lady with the pink eyes eating meat pie with the giant. It was on an evening in August that I chanced upon this ravishing spectacle, and I noticed that, whereas the giant reclined half concealed beneath the overhanging boughs and seemed indifferent to nature, the white hair of the gracious lady streamed free in the breath of evening, and her pink eyes found pleasure in the landscape. I heard only a single sentence of her uttering, yet it bespoke a talent for modest repartee. The ill-mannered giant — accursed be his evil race! — had interrupted the lady in some remark, and, as I passed that enchanted corner of the wood, she gently reproved him with the words, “Now, Cobby;” — Cobby! so short a name! — ” ain’t one fool enough to talk at a time?”

This describes the neighbourhood of Gads Hill as probably only Dickens could have described it. Of the house, Gads Hill Place, little need be said here, as it has been so thoroughly done by Forster. It is a comfortable, old-fashioned house, built about a century since, in the reign of George III., and is on the very spot mentioned in Shakespeare’s Henry IV. as the scene of the robbery of the travellers.

Gads Hill had been the scene of many robberies on the highway, long before Shakespeare conferred upon it what may now be called its first world-wide renown. An extract or two from the parish registers of Gravesend will serve to show that Travellers in these parts did not always tamely submit to be spoiled of their goods.

Thus we find the following entry: — ” 1586, September 29th daye, was a thiefe yt was slayne, buried.” And again, “1590, Marche the 17th daie, was a theefe yt was at Gadshill wounded to deathe, called Robert Writs, buried.”

Also in John Clavell's "Recantation of an ill-led life" published in 1634, we find the following allusion to the well known character of this part of the Dover Road.

"For though I oft have seen Gads-hill and those Red tops of mountains, where good people lose Their ill-kept purses. I did never climbe Parnassus' Hill or could aduenture time To tread the muse's mazes, * * *

*" The circumstances connected with the purchase of this estate by Dickens are so remarkable that it will be as well to give an extract from a letter from Dickens to his friend M. de Cerjat, written in 1857, fully detailing them : —

I happened to be walking past [the house] a year and a half or so ago, with my sub-editor of Household Words (Mr. W. H. Wills,) when I said to him, "You see that house? It has always a curious interest for me, because when I was a small boy down in these parts I thought it the most beautiful house (I suppose because of its famous old cedar trees) ever seen. And my poor father used to bring me to look at it, and used to say that if ever I grew up to be a clever man perhaps I might own that house, or such another house. In remembrance of which I have always in passing looked to see if it was to be sold or let, and it has never been to me like any other house, and it has never changed at all." We came back to town, and my friend went out to dinner. Next morning he came to me in great excitement and said, "It is written that you are to have that house at Gads Hill. The lady I had allotted to me to take down to dinner yesterday began to speak of that neighbourhood. 'You know it?' I said; 'I have been there to-day.' 'O yes,' she said, 'I know it very well. I was a child there in the house they call Gads Hill Place. My father was the rector, and lived there many years. He has just died, has left it to me, and I want to sell it.' So," says the sub-editor, "you must buy it. Now or never!" I did, and hope to pass next summer there.

Nearly opposite Gads Hill Place, is the Falstaff Inn, dating probably from Queen Anne's time. It formerly had an old-fashioned swinging sign, on one side of which was painted Falstaff fighting with the men in buckram suits, and on the other, Falstaff being pitched into the Thames from a buck-basket, the merry wives of Windsor looking on approvingly. In its long, sanded room there was a copy of Shakespeare's monument in Westminster Abbey, with the inscription, "The cloud-capt towers, the gorgeous palaces," and so forth. It is worth noting, that forty years ago, something like ninety coaches passed this old hostelry every day!

The Railways have altered that, and although it is still true, as Mr. F 's Aunt says, that, "there's milestones on the Dover road,"* it is also true that, in some places there is very little else; for in parts of the road grass struggles successfully with the diminished traffic of these latter days.

"Dullborough Town" is the title of another chapter of the Uncommercial Traveller; and is another name for Rochester.

The following extracts show more clearly perhaps than any other portion of the writings of Charles Dickens, how he clung to the memories of his childhood, and how he still loved Rochester when in the full-tide of his popularity, and in the prime of his life.

As the uncommercial saunters along a street, he at last recognises a man he had known many years before, when a child. * * * "It was he himself; he might formerly have been an old-looking young man, or he might now be a young-looking old man, but there he was." * * * Addressing the man (a greengrocer) he wishes to explain that he formerly as a boy had the honour of his acquaintance, but he quite failed to excite the interest of his former acquaintance. * * *

Nettled by his plegmatic conduct, I informed him that I had left the town when I was a child. He slowly returned, quite unsoftened, and not without a sarcastic kind of complacency, Had I? Ah! And did I find it had got on tolerably well without me? Such is the difference (I thought, when I had left him a few hundred yards behind, and was by so much in a better temper) between going away from a place and remaining in it. I had no right, I reflected, to be angry with the greengrocer for his want of interest; I was nothing to him: whereas he was the town, the cathedral, the bridge, the river, my childhood, and a large slice of my life, to me.

There is probably more of fact than fiction, in the following extract from the same chapter.

As I left Dullborough in the days when there were no railroads in the land, I left it in a stage coach. Through all the years that have since passed have I ever lost the smell of the damp straw in which I was packed — like game — and forwarded, carriage paid, to the Cross Keys, Wood Street, Cheapside, London? There was no other inside passenger, and it rained hard all the way, and I thought life sloppier than I had expected to find it.

The coach that had carried me away was melodiously called Timpson's Blue-eyed Maid, and belonged to Timpson, at the coach office up street; the locomotive engine that had brought me back was called severely No. 97 and belonged to S.E.R., and was spitting ashes and hot water over the blighted ground.

When I had been let out at the platform door the first discovery I made was that the station had swallowed up the playing field. I looked in again over the low wall at the scene of departed glories. Here, in the haymaking time, had I been delivered from the dungeons of Seringapatam, an immense pile (of haycock,) by my countrymen, the victorious British (boy next door and his two cousins,) and had been recognized with ecstasy by my affianced one (Miss Green,) who had come all the way from England (second house in the terrace) to ransom me and marry me. Here had I first heard of the existence of a terrible banditti, called "The Radicals," whose principles were that the Prince Regent wore stays, and that nobody had a right to any salary, and that the army and navy ought to be put down — horrors at which I trembled in my bed, after supplicating that the Radicals might be speedily taken and hanged.

The theatre was in existence, I found, and I resolved to comfort my mind by going to look at it. Many wondrous secrets of nature had I come to the knowledge of in that sanctuary, of which not the least terrific were, that the witches of Macbeth bore an awful resemblance to the thanes and other proper inhabitants of Scotland; and that the good King Duncan couldn't rest in his grave, but was constantly coming out of it and calling himself somebody else. To the theatre, therefore, I repaired for consolation. But I found very little, for it was in a bad and declining way. No, there was no comfort in the theatre. It was mysteriously gone, like my own youth — unlike my own youth, it might be coming back some day; but there was little promise of it.

Of course the town had shrunk fearfully since I was a child there. I found the High Street little better than a lane. There was a public clock in it which I had supposed to be the finest clock in the world: whereas it now turned out to be as inexpressive, moon-faced, and weak a clock as ever I saw.

I had not gone fifty paces along the street when I was suddenly brought up by the sight of a man who got out of a little phaeton at the doctor's door, and went into the doctor's house. Immediately the air was filled with the scent of trodden grass, and the perspective of years opened, and at the end of it was a little likeness of this man keeping a wicket, and I said "God bless my soul! Joe Specks!" Scorning to ask the boy left in the phaeton whether it was really Joe, and scorning even to read the brass plate on the door — so sure was I — I rang the bell and informed the servant maid that a stranger sought audience of Mr. Specks. Into a room half surgery, half study, I was shown to await his coming.

When my old schoolfellow came in and I informed him with a smile that I was not a patient, he seemed rather at a loss to perceive any reason for smiling in connection with that fact, and enquired to what was he to attribute the honour? I asked him with another smile could he remember me at all? He had not (he said) that pleasure. I was beginning to have but a poor opinion of Mr. Specks, when he said reflectively, "And yet there's a something, too." Upon that I saw a boyish light in his eyes that looked well, and I asked him if he could inform me, as a stranger who desired to know and had not the means of reference at hand, what the name of the young lady was who married Mr. Random? Upon that he said "Narcissa," and, after staring for a moment called me by my name, shook- me by the hand, and melted into a roar of laughter. “Why, of course,” you’ll remember Lucy Green,” he said, after we had talked a little. “Of course,” said I. “Whom do you think she married?” said he. “You?” I hazarded. “Me,” said Specks, “and you shall see her.” So I saw her, and she was fat, and if all the hay in the world had been heaped upon her it could scarcely have altered her face more than time had altered it from my remembrance of the face that had once looked down upon me into the fragrant dungeons of Seringapatam. *

We talked immensely, Specks, and Mrs. Specks, and I, and we spoke of our old selves as though our old selves were dead and gone, and indeed, indeed they were — dead and gone as the playing field that had become a wilderness of rusty iron, and the property of S .E. R.

When I went to catch my train at night I Was in a more charitable mood with Dullborough than I had been all day; and yet in my heart I had loved it all day too. Ah! who was I that I should quarrel with the town for being changed to me, when I myself had come back so changed to it! All my early readings and early imaginations dated from this place, and I took them away so full of innocent construction and guileless belief, and I brought them back so worn and torn, so much the wiser and so much the worse!

In another paper of the Uncommercial Traveller there is a graphic description of Chatham Dockyard and the machinery there, also of the appearance of the Medway and the marshes beyond. In Paper 26 there is a reminiscence of a funeral Dickens attended when a child at Chatham, and the impressions it made on his mind. “Other funerals,” he says, “have I seen with grown-up eyes since that day, of which the burden has been the same childish burden. Making game. Real affliction, real grief and solemnity, have been outraged, and the funeral has been performed.” These impressions enlarged on in nearly all his other works have gone far to abolish the absurdities and extravagance of modern funeral customs.

In 1861 Great Expectations appeared. The opening scene is Cooling Churchyard, near Rochester, beyond which lies a large tract of marsh country extending from the Medway to the estuary of the Thames. While at Rochester in August, 1879, with Mr. Hull, we drove out to look at the spot, and the sketch is one I made of the church and churchyard. (See Tail-piece.)

The curious rows of little coffin-shaped stones are still to be seen exactly as described by Pip, but with this difference, the tale says there are five of them, Forster says there are “a dozen,” the real number is thirteen, — and they are all the children of one family! Even the names of the children are accurately given so far as they go.

This tale has many allusions to Rochester, but mostly under

*” Death doesn’t change us more than life my dear.” — Old Curiosity Shop. Chap. XVII.

the name of “Our market town.” According to Forster, “Restoration House,” as it is called, stands for the “Satis House” in the tale. That may be so, but it certainly is not the “Satis House” where Richard Watts entertained Queen Elizabeth. That stood on Boley Hill, close up to the curtain wall of the castle, and overlooking the river. A portion of this fine old house is incorporated with the new one built about a century since.

There is a fine description of the desolate tract of wild marshes beyond the village of Cooling, and of the “fearful wild fowl” in the shape of escaped convicts sometimes caught there. Pip, the hero of the story, says: —

To five little stone lozenges, each about a foot and a half long, which were arranged in a neat row, and were sacred to the memory of five little brothers of mine — who gave up trying to get a living exceedingly early in that universal struggle — I am indebted for a belief I religiously entertained that they had all been born on their backs, with their hands in their trouser pockets, and had never taken them out in this state of existence. Ours was the marsh country, down, by the river, within, as the river wound, twenty miles of the sea. My first most vivid and broad impression of the identity of things seems to me to have been gained on a memorable raw afternoon towards evening. At such a time I found out, for certain, that this bleak place overgrown with nettles was the churchyard; and that the dark flat wilderness beyond the churchyard was the marshes; and that the low leaden line beyond was the river; and that the distant savage lair from which the wind was rushing was the sea; and that the small bundle of shivers growing afraid of it all, and beginning to cry, was Pip. “Hold your noise!” cried a terrible voice, as a man started up from among the graves at the side of the church porch. “Keep still, you little devil, or I’ll cut your throat!”

A fearful man all in coarse grey, with a great iron on his leg. A man with no hat, and with broken shoes, and with an old rag tied round his head. A man who had been soaked in water, and smothered in mud, and lamed by stones, and cut by flints, and stung by nettles, and torn by briars; who limped and shivered, and glared and growled; and whose teeth chattered in his head as he seized me by the chin.

The convict makes the frightened boy promise to bring him in the morning a file and some “wittles,” and then takes himself off, “hugging his shuddering body in both his arms, and picking his way among the nettles, and among the brambles that bound the green mounds, as if he were eluding the hands of the dead people, stretching up cautiously out of their graves to get a twist upon his ankle and pull him in.” Pip gets the file and the “wittles,”

EASTGATE, ROCHESTER.

and in the morning finds the convict at an old battery on the marshes: —

Hugging himself and limping to and fro as if he had never all night left off hugging and limping. He was awfully cold, to be sure. I half expected to see him drop down before my face, and die of deadly cold. His eyes looked so awfully hungry, too, that when I handed him the file, and he laid it down on the grass, it occurred to me he would have tried to eat it if he had not seen my bundle. “What’s in the bottle, boy?” said he. “Brandy,” said I. He was already handing mince-meat down his throat in the most curious manner — more like a man who was putting it away somewhere in a violent hurry than a man who was eating it — -but he left off to take some of the liquor. He shivered all the while so violently that it was quite as much as he could do to keep the neck of the bottle between his teeth without biting it off. "I think you have got the ague," said I. "I'm much of your opinion, boy," said he. "It's bad about here," I told him. "You've been lying out on the meshes, and they're dreadful aguish. Rheumatic too." "I'll eat my breakfast afore they're the death of me," said he. "I'll beat the shivers so far, I'll bet you." He was gobbling mince-meat, meat-bone, bread, cheese, and pork pie all at once; staring distrustfully while he did so at the mist all around us, and often stopping — even stopping his jaws — to listen. Some real or fancied sound, some clink upon the river or breathing of beast upon the marsh, now gave him a start, and he said suddenly: "You're not a deceiving imp? You brought no one with you?" "No, sir! no!" "Nor giv' no one the office to follow you?" "No!" "Well," said he, "I believe you. You'd be but a fierce young hound indeed if, at your time of life, you could help to hunt a wretched warmint, hunted as near death and dunghill as this poor wretched warmint is!" Something clicked in his throat as if he had works in him like a clock, and was going to strike. And he smeared his ragged, rough sleeve over his eyes.

Dickens must have had many opportunities of observing the appearance and condition of the Chatham convicts, and there are many vivid glimpses of convict life in this tale. The captured convicts in this chapter, were spirited away to the hulk lying out in the Medway, and looking by night like "a wicked Noah's Ark." He also describes in another chapter the manner of conveying convicts to Chatham by coach, and how ordinary outside passengers first became aware of their presence by their "bringing with them that curious flavour of bread poultice, baize, rope yarn, and hearthstone, which attends the convict presence."

Farther on in the tale, Pip is taken to the Town Hall to be bound apprentice to Joe Gargery, the blacksmith. The "Hall," is of course the Guildhall, Rochester.

The Hall was a queer place I thought, with higher pews in it than a church, * * * and with mighty justices leaning back in chairs, with folded arms, or taking snuff, or going to sleep, or writing, or reading the newspapers, * * * and with some shining black portraits on the walls, which my unartistic eye regarded as a composition of hardbake and sticking-plaster. There in a corner my indentures were duly signed and attested, and I was "bound;" Mr. Pumblechook holding me all the while as if we had looked in on our way to the scaffold, to have those little preliminaries disposed of.

At the dinner and merry-making at the Blue Boar, which followed, Pip complains that being sleepy, his friends kept waking him up, and telling him to enjoy himself, — and farther on in the evening

Mr. Wopsle gave us Collins's Ode, and threw his blood-stained sword in thunder down, with such an effect, that a waiter came in and said "The commercials underneath sent up their compliments, and it wasn't the Tumblers Arms."

The Blue Boar so often mentioned in this tale is undoubtedly intended for the Bull Hotel in the High Street

The following extract may have been and very likely was, a personal experience of Dickens on revisiting Rochester. In the story it is the experience of Pip, after he had for a time realized his great expectations: —

It was interesting to be in the quiet old town once more, and it was not disagreeable to be here and there suddenly recognized and stared after. One or two of the tradespeople even darted out of their shops, and went a little way down the street before me, that they might turn, as if they had forgotten something, and pass me face to face — on which occasions I don't know whether they or I made the most pretence; they of not doing it, or I of not seeing it.

The story of Great Expectations lies either in Rochester and neighbourhood or London, and, like Edwin Drood, is so full of Rochester and London that either book might equally with his terrible story of the French Revolution have been called A Tale of Two Cities.

Many characters in the earlier and later books of Charles Dickens are, it is well known, taken from actual life, and have been thought by some still living in these towns to be much too easily recognizable to be pleasant.

Names of places, too, are occasionally used in works that do not otherwise touch on Rochester district at all; for instance, in Bleak House, a rookery in London is called "Tom-all-alone's," which to thousands not in the secret may seem an unmeaning name. It is really the name of an outlying district of Chatham, at the back of the Lines, and is now being nearly all absorbed in the dockyard extension. There is or was lately here a tavern also called "Tom-all-alone's." Of the names of characters throughout the works of Dickens, many are drawn from these towns. Hubble, Jasper, Cobb, Dowler, Larkins, and many others are well-known local names;

Caleb Pordage and Fanny Dorritt lie side by side in the cathedral graveyard; and there is a Weller, a greengrocer, in High Street, Chatham.

In the last work of Dickens, Rochester figures again as Cloisterham, and there are several fine passages in the fragment relating to his favourite spot. In a letter to Forster, written some six years before his death, he says: — "I have grown hard to satisfy, and write very slowly." There is, however, no doubt that this work shows no falling off either in invention or descriptive power; and although his statement to his friend, "that he had grown hard to satisfy," is fully borne out by a careful examination of the manuscript, where erasures and interlineations are numerous, perhaps few will doubt that this, his last work, is one of his best, if not the best of all.

It may be noted, too, that towards the close of his life Charles Dickens seems to have been more frequently in the immediate precincts of the cathedral than ever before; this may very probably have been in order to make a closer study of its surroundings, for use as the story developed itself. The apparitor of the cathedral (the Mr. Tope of the tale) says: — "he often saw Mr. Dickens about the cathedral during the last few months of his life; and for some time he took no particular notice of him, not knowing who he was." And to the remark, "Ah, but he was taking notice of you!" he replied "Very true, sir, very true," and seemed pleased with the recognition of his portrait. The curious character, Durdles, who has only recently disappeared from the neighbourhood, was from the life, as was also, to some extent, Mr. Sapsea. There is plenty of good comedy in Edwin Drood, * but it is rather noticeable for a quieter and more thoughtfully subdued tone throughout. The first extract describes Eastgate House, or the Nun's House of the tale, the High Street, and Mr. Sapsea's premises. Mr. Hull's drawings of the High Street and Eastgate give capital views of this part of Rochester.

* It is believed on good grounds, that (with the alteration of one letter,) Edwin Drood is named after a former Landlord of the Falstaff, his name being Edwin Trood.

A drowsy city, Cloisterham, whose inhabitants seem to suppose, with an inconsistency more strange than rare, that all its changes lie behind it, and that there are no more to come. A queer moral to derive from antiquity, yet older than any traceable antiquity.

So silent are the streets of Cloisterham (though prone to echo on the smallest provocation,) that of a summer day the sunblinds of its shops scarce dare to flap in the south wind; while the sun-browned tramps who pass along and stare, quicken their limp a little, that they may the sooner get beyond the confines of its oppressive respectability.

In a word, a city of another and a bygone time is Cloisterham, with its hoarse cathedral bell, its hoarse rooks hovering about the cathedral tower, its hoarser and less distinct rooks in the stalls far beneath.

In the midst of Cloisterham stands the Nun's House; a venerable brick edifice, whose present appellation is doubtless derived from the legend of its conventual uses. On the trim gate enclosing its old courtyard is a resplendent brass plate flashing forth the legend "Seminary for Young Ladies. Miss Twinkleton." The house front is so old and worn, and the brass plate is so shining and staring, that the general result has reminded imaginative strangers of a battered old beau with a large modern eyeglass stuck in his blind eye. * * # # # # #

Mr. Sapsea's premises are in the High Street, over against the Nun's House. They are of about the period of the Nun's House, irregularly modernized here and there, as steadily deteriorating generations found, more and more, that they preferred air and light to fever and the plague. Over the doorway is a wooden effigy, about half life size, representing Mr. Sapsea's father, in a curly wig and toga, in the act of selling. The chastity of the idea, and the natural appearance of the little finger, hammer, and pulpit, have been much admired.

The figure of the auctioneer just mentioned, disappeared some twenty-five years since, but the description of it, and it is said of the auctioneer also, was true to life; certain it is that, when Charles Dickens died, the successors of this very auctioneer, Messrs. Thomas and Homan, were employed by the executors to sell the furniture and effects at Gads Hill Place. Here follows a description of Minor Canon Row, or, as it is called in the tale, "Minor Canon Corner," the residence of the minor canons. Mr. Hull's beautiful drawing was sketched under difficulties, and we were more than once invited into the nearest house in the row, the corner one, out of the pitiless rain. What we were shown there convinced us that Dickens had been there before us, as his account of the interior of Canon Crisparkle's house is photographic in its accuracy.

Minor Canon Corner was a quiet place in the shadow of the cathedral, which the cawing of the rooks, the echoing footsteps of rare passers, the sound of the cathedral bell, or the roll of the cathedral organ, seemed to render more quiet than absolute silence. Swaggering righting men had had their centuries of ramping and raving about Minor Canon Corner, and beaten serfs had had their centuries of drudging and dying there, and powerful monks had had their centuries of being sometimes useful and sometimes harmful there; and behold, they were all gone out of Minor Canon Corner, and so much the better. Perhaps one of the highest uses of their ever having been there was that there might be left behind that blessed air of tranquillity which pervaded Minor Canon Corner, and that serenely romantic state of the mind, productive for the most part of pity and forbearance, which is engendered by a sorrowful story that is all told, or a pathetic play that is played out.

Red-brick walls harmoniously toned down in color by time, strong-rooted ivy, latticed windows, panelled rooms, big oaken beams in little places, and stone-walled gardens where annual fruit yet ripened upon monkish trees, were the principal surroundings of pretty old Mrs. Crisparkle and the Reverend Septimus as they sat at breakfast.

Here is what Mr. Grewgious saw and heard as he stood at the great west door of the cathedral on the afternoon of a fine autumn day: —

“Dear me,” said Mr. Grewgious, peeping in, “it’s like looking down the throat of Old Time.”

Old Time heaved a mouldy sigh from tomb and arch and vault; and gloomy shadows began to deepen in corners; and dampy began to rise from green patches of stone; and jewels, cast upon the pavement of the nave from stained glass by the declining sun, began to perish. Within the grill-gate of the chancel, up the steps surmounted loomingly by the fast darkening organ, white robes could be dimly seen, and one feeble voice, rising and falling in a cracked monotonous mutter, could at intervals be faintly heard. In the free outer air, the river, the green pastures, and the brown arable lands, the teeming hills and dales, were reddened by the sunset; while the distant little windows in windmills and farm homesteads shone patches of bright beaten gold. In the cathedral all became grey, murky, and sepulchral, and the cracked monotonous mutter went on like a dying voice, until the organ and the choir burst forth, and drowned it in a sea of music. Then the sea fell, and the dying voice made another feeble effort, and then the sea rose high, and beat its life out, and lashed the roof, and surged among the arches, and pierced the heights of the great tower; and then the sea was dry, and all was still.

The old building before mentioned, called “Restoration House,” has always in the memory of man been said to be haunted. The story is that a lady, with a child in her arms and a rope dangling from her neck, has been seen, not only in the house, but in the Vines opposite (the monk’s vineyard of the story,) and in parts of the precincts. Dickens says : —

A certain awful hush pervades the ancient pile, the cloisters, and the churchyard, after dark, which not many people care to encounter. The cause of this is not to be found in any local superstition that attaches to the precincts, but it is to be sought in the innate shrinking of dust with the breath of life in it from dust out of which the breath of life has passed; also in the widely diffused, and almost as widely unacknowledged, reflection: “If the dead do, under any circumstances, become visible to the living, these are such likely surroundings for the purpose that I, the living, will get out of them as soon as I can.”

This reminds one of that fine passage in Rasselas, where Imlac says: — ” That the dead are seen no more I will not undertake to maintain against the concurrent and unvaried testimony of all ages and of all nations. That it is doubted by single cavillers can very little weaken the general evidence; and many who deny it with their tongues confess it by their fears.”

Christmas Eve in Cloisterham : —

A few strange faces in the streets; a few other faces, half strange and half familiar, once the faces of Cloisterham children, now the faces of men and women who come back from the outer world at long intervals. To these, the striking of the cathedral clock, and the cawing of the rooks, are like voices of their nursery time.

To such as these, it has happened in their dying hours afar off, that they have imagined their chamber floor to be strewn with the autumnal leaves fallen from the elm trees in the close: so have the rustling sounds and fresh scents of their earliest impressions revived, when the circle of their lives was very nearly traced, and the beginning and the end were drawing close together.

The next and last extract was written at Gads Hill, on the morning of the 8th of June, 1870, in the Swiss chalet which stood in the grounds on the opposite side of the road; and in the evening Charles Dickens was stricken with apoplexy, and died the next day. The weather was unusually fine and warm,* and in the morning of his last day of consciousness we find him thus beautifully describing the effects of such a morning in his favourite spot: —

A brilliant morning shines on the old city. Its antiquities and ruins are surpassingly beautiful, with the lusty ivy gleaming in the sun, and the rich trees waving in the balmy air. Changes of glorious light from moving boughs, songs of birds, scents from gardens, woods, and fields — or rather, from the one great garden of the whole cultivated island in its yielding time — penetrate into the cathedral, subdue its earthly odour, and preach the Resurrection and the Life. The cold stone tombs of centuries ago grow warm; and flecks of brightness dart into the sternest marble corners of the building, fluttering there like wings.

* ‘The June weather was delicious. The sky was blue, the larks were soaring high over the green corn, I thought all that country-side more beautiful and peaceful by far than I had ever known it to be yet.’ — Great Expectations. Chap. LVIII.

Having thus glanced at all the works of Dickens containing references to this neighbourhood, it remains only to note that, although none of the books between Pickwick and David Copperfield touch upon Rochester, we can by the aid of Forster's Life of Dickens, and the two volumes of Letters published by Miss Dickens, and her Aunt, get many glimpses of his old love for these towns. Charles Dickens never wearied of taking his friends Forster, Maclise, Stanfield, Leech, Longfellow, Fields, Wilkie Collins, and many others to see the places he had known from childhood; and which places may certainly be said to have left their influences, — very beneficent influences too — upon the whole of his after life.

Charles Dickens has now been in his grave ten years, and although it would not be becoming in me to express any opinion as to the relative value of his works, or the hold they are destined to take on posterity, I may say that I have taken some little pains to get an expression of opinion from the booksellers as to the present and probable future sale of his books. To quote a term used in the trade, "Dickens is still alive." The sales are good, and to all appearances likely to continue so permanently, and there is an entirely new edition recently published, the Pocket Edition, which is selling well. Of Dickens himself it may be said that probably there has not been another man so entirely beloved by all classes of people during the present century.*

Some persons it is true have written and thought disparagingly of our great novelist, but it has perhaps been more from ignorance of the facts than from any other cause. The publishing lately of his private letters, written to all sorts and conditions of men, has let in a flood of light as to the real character of this gifted, generous man.

It is not too much to say that very few men could have passed through that greatest of all trials, unbounded success and popularity, and yet have remained, as he did, unspoiled to the last! Prosperity, in his case, only served to bring out the sterling good qualities of the man, not to dwarf or narrow them. Most men

* It may be recorded here on the best authority, that of Dean Stanley, that occasionally to this day, flowers, and now and then a wreath, are laid on the grave of Dickens in Westminster Abbey. This is independent of a fine wreath of choice flowers placed there annually by loving hands on the ninth of June.

starting in life as poor as he, would, when they had attained to riches and honour, have turned Conservative in the worst sense of the word, while he, as we all know, remained a consistent Radical to his life's end.

Charles Dickens was "born with Heavenly compassion in his heart,"* and was ever ready to help with money and with hard work the families of deceased literary men, and others less fortunate than himself. He no more believed "that people with nought are naughty" than did Thomas Hood, the genial author of that punning line.

To learn how world-wide is the knowledge of the works of Charles Dickens we have but to look to the newspaper press of the present day, whether metropolitan, provincial, or colonial. Take up a newspaper where you will in the English-speaking portions of our globe, and oftener than not you will find one or more quotations from his books in its leaders. And what is quite as remarkable, quotations, phrases, and sayings from Dickens are noticeably more and more getting into our language.

So that, finally, it may be said of him, without exaggeration, that "his sound is gone out into all lands, and his words to the ends of the world!"

A WALK WITH AN IMMORTAL

BY ALFRED T. STORY

One afternoon late in the sixties a youth was walking along a country road above the town of Blackburn, enjoying at one and the same time the fresh air, the pleasant autumn landscape, and a book. Though it was the beginning of October, the shortening days were still pleasant. There was enough edge to the breeze to make walking agreeable, enough warmth in the sunshine to render an extra coat unnecessary. The trees were still covered with foliage, the swallows had not yet gone.

Sauntering along, book in hand, the youth now read a page, now permitted his eye to wander away to what of life or beauty the declining year afforded. Here it was a flower of the purple scabious, there a cluster of the scarlet berries of the cornel. But anon a rarer sight presented itself — a dwarf bush of alder, thickly covered with snails. Every tiniest leaf had its snail; the larger ones two or three. To see so many of the slimy molluscs in one tree, and every mollusc with his house on his back, was not a thing to be met with every day; and the youth bent over the bush with curious eyes.

So interested was he in the spectacle that he did not notice the approach of a stranger who had been walking a little way behind, and who, seeing him so intent upon something in the hedge-bottom, stopped and inquired,

“What is it you are gazing at so intently there?”

The youth, without removing his eyes, pointed to the alder and its inhabitants. “Look!” said he. “What is the meaning of that?”

“It looks like a snail parliament, doesn’t it?” said the stranger, after gazing at the bush for a brief moment.

There was something so novel in the suggestion that the youth looked up at the querist, a man in the prime of life, grizzled, with pointed beard, and a hard felt hat. He wore a blue pilot-coat, tightly buttoned. But the thing of all others to remember was his superb eyes, largo, brown, and full of light.

They smiled upon the youth as he added to his first remark, again looking at the mollusc assemblage, “There is evidently a national crisis of some sort, and the snail people have sent up their delegates.”

The youth laughed. “A queer parliament-house though, isn’t it?”

“It is rather; but Parliament does sometimes get up a tree, you know. What do you think brings them there- -you seem something of a student?”

“O, I can only suppose they have climbed up there for an airing.”

“Ay, likely enough — and to get a sight of the sun. We all — every living thing of us — like to see the sun, to bask in the light. That is what has brought you and me out of the smoke of the town this cheery afternoon — is it not?”

The youth acquiesced. “There was nothing so delightful,” said he.

“Unless it be a book,” observed the light-lover with a smile, glancing at a small volume protruding from the youth’s pocket.

“Oh, yes, a pleasant book enhances the enjoyment; but this is hardly a book in that sense,” replied the younger wayfarer, drawing forth a dry handbook on some subject. “It is no more a real book than”

“Than a bat is a bird, eh?” suggested the stranger.

This remark led to a chat about books in general as the two walked along, after having seen all there was to be seen about the snails. The younger companion stated his preferences — history, biography, poetry, natural history.

“Ah, that is the study to inform and enlarge the mind — natural history, the study of nature!” exclaimed the gentleman.

“I could be content with that; only my natural history should not exclude man. He, equally with every living thing, is a part of nature.”

“Would you leave out poetry?” queried the younger.

“By no means,” was the reply. “Natural history is poetry. Listen to that robin; is not that living poetry? All the year’s choir is silent except that bird. And what a contented note it is. If we could all preach cheerfulness like that! I should perhaps say ‘teach’ not ‘preach,’ for he gives us example rather than precept, and that is the best for instruction.” A few steps further on brought the wayfarers to a field over which a number of swallows were darting and circling about with little cries of delight.

“Look,” said the gentleman, “there are some more light-lovers.”

He stood for a moment or two watching them; then, as a path led through the field, winding up a slight elevation, he said, “It looks pleasanter up there than along the road — if you are for a further stroll. But perhaps you want to be alone to read your book?”

“By no means,” replied the youth.

He was already too fascinated with his chance companion to care any more that day for his book. So the two wandered on together over the fields, through a wooded vale, and back by the fields and the road; the elder man talking, asking questions, stopping now to look at the prospect, now to examine some object of interest, the younger full of curiosity, answering oddly to questions asked, causing his companion every now and again to smile quietly, possibly at his naïveté, possibly at his enthusiasms.

“So you want to be a writer, eh?” came the question at length.

“It is a dream.”

“A dream is not a bad thing — if you put a heft to it.”

The youth considered; then, thinking he had grasped his companion’s meaning, he said, “Of course, one can do nothing by mere dreaming; I would not care how much hard work it cost or how long it took, if”

“Good! But in the meantime what about your living? It is up-hill work, this writing business — they say so at least — and hard to make a living at. There are a good many in Loudon, who, according to all accounts, do not find it a mint.”

“But some do fairly well?”

“Fairly — I know one or two who do. But what kind of writing do you wish to be at? Have you tried your hand at anything?”

The youth replied that he had essayed something in the story line, and caused his companion to laugh very heartily by telling him that he could not get his characters to do anything of themselves: they were so wooden that everything had to be done for them.

“You want your puppets then to be so full of life that when you have created them they will begin to think and act for themselves, eh? If you can do that you will be as great a magician as Moses. But give me an instance.”

This brought out the outline of a village legend which the would-be yarn-spinner was trying to make something of. A young fellow has won the heart of the village belle, and the day of the wedding has arrived. Rising early, he sets off for a lake in the woods for a bath; but after finishing his swim he finds his clothes gone, stolen by envious rivals. It is a lonely, out-of-the-way spot; nobody comes near; and there he lingers, helpless, until the bells begin to ring — the wedding bells. The legend says he improvised some sort of covering and ran pell-mell into the village, to find the wedding-party returning to their homes. But there the bridegroom is — in the woods — Adam-like — too wooden to devise any means of escape out of his dilemma.

“Rather a bad hole for the poor fellow,” commented the light-lover. “But you would have thought, being a countryman, that he would have contrived somehow to bark a tree and make himself a sort of wooden shirt — a shield back and front, so to speak. But, as you say, the great art is to be able to make your characters think and act for themselves. The secret will no doubt come in time — if it is in you.” “A big if,” cried the youth.

“Yes, rather a formidable one,” returned his companion; “but there are other fields for the pen besides that of fiction — and I am not sure but there are higher ones. Anyway, I do not know that that matters if you only got the right key.”

“And what is that?”

“To be sure your heart is in the right place, and write from that. I know a man who has written a good deal, whose works are rather well thought of, and who attributes all his popularity to the fact that he never set down a word that he would have been ashamed to read to the one he loved and honoured the most. That is what I call the right key. It is the key that will unlock the heart of the people in the end — if anything will.”

The last words were accompanied by a smile. He added: “Don’t be discouraged by a little failure. The higher your aim, you know, the bigger your climb. They used to give a youth seven years to learn to make a pair of boots; if a man learns in three times that to write a book he may consider himself lucky.”

“A pretty long apprenticeship!”

“It is rather. But then the apprentice lives in the meantime.” The youth pondered.

“I knew one man,” said the elder, “who did fairly well by writing love poems for lovers who had not the wit to do so for themselves, composing rhymed advertisements, and the like. But it proved rather bad for him, because it caused his sweetheart to throw him over; she said he wrote better verses for other men’s lovers than for his own.”

“Suppose you were in my place now?” said the would-be writer.

“Ah! I could not suppose that! But” — with a broad smile — “if I had my life to go over again I think I would risk the three times seven.” Then more seriously, "In any case it is better to aim high and fail than to aim low and hit."

By this time the chance companions had reached the outskirts of the town, or rather of the local park, which overlooks the town on the east. Blackburn is, or was, a smoky and malodorous place, with hideous stacks of reeking chimneys ; but for once, under the glamour of an almost unparalleled sunset, it looked absolutely beautiful, the grimmest objects of the scene having the appearance of colossal pillars supporting the roof of some gorgeous hall. It was a sight to enthral, and the light-lover stood and gazed upon it for several minutes in silence, removing his hat as though in reverence. Then for the first time the youth noticed the lines of thought and care upon his brow. He ventured to observe that it was "very beautiful."

"Beautiful, indeed! Wonderful !" murmured the elder. Then after a pause, "Ah, if we could all go down like that after the day's work!"

There was something like a suggestion of dew in his eyes as he spoke, and he looked away as though to hide it. When he turned to his companion again it was to bid him farewell. "When you write," he said, "put something of the spirit that is there into your writings. Try to make people feel that we are living in an eternity that net or ends, and that it is worth while endeavouring to be great — like that sunset."

* * * *

In the evening the youth went to hear a reading at the Town-hall by Charles Dickens; the subject being "Mrs. Lirriper's Lodgings." The place was full to overflowing, and when Mr. Dickens entered the whole audience rose in mass. He was in evening dress, and fresh as though from a band-box ; but there was no mistaking those eyes of his ; and his companion of the afternoon, seated right in front of him, felt that he was speaking and acting specially to him the evening through.

Whilst the audience were leaving the hall, Mr. Dickens stood on the steps leading up to the platform shaking hands and conversing with several ladies and gentlemen. As the youth passed him, wondering whether he had been recognized or not, the famous novelist caught sight of him, descended a step lower, held out his hand, and pressing warmly the one extended to him in return, gave him a hearty " Good luck — and God bless you!"

NEW CHAPTERS FROM 'The Life of Dickens'

Editor's Note. — In February next the English-speaking world will celebrate the centenary of the birth of Charles Dickens. The Cosmopolitan proposes to do honor to the memory of the great novelist by presenting his countless admirers with a series of articles which it has been fortunate enough to secure from those who were themselves his intimate associates. We think we may safely promise our readers the most remarkable Dickens feature which has ever been offered by a magazine. The first article — written by Mr. Alfred Tennyson Dickens, the eldest surviving son of the novelist, who has recently returned from Australia and here writes of his father for the first time — is given this month.

My Father and His Friends

By Alfred Tennyson Dickens

SINCE my father's death in 1870 many very interesting books concerning his works and his life have been given to the world by able writers, not only here in England, but all over Europe and in America and the Colonies, where his novels are more intimately known than are those of almost any other author of his time. But each day adds to the difficulty writers experience in finding anything worth telling about him, for everything has been told, and whatever is now written must inevitably read like a repetition of what has been already said. There are many of my father's admirers, however, who, looking upon his memory as they do with the warm affection of a personal friendship, never tire of reading his stories or of seeking for further details relating to his life, and to the desire of satisfying the affectionate curiosity of these admirers may be attributed sometimes a slight amount of exaggeration that creeps into the descriptions we come across of his habits, manner, and appearance; indeed, I remember having read somewhere of various gorgeous articles of apparel, supposed to have been worn habitually by my father, that were certainly never seen upon his person, either at home or elsewhere, and that must have existed solely in the fertile imagination of the writer.

In the short article I am about to write I shall confine myself to describing a few facts and impressions connected with our home life and that came under my notice during my holidays from school, and the impressions I give of my father will be those of the boy I was before leaving England for Australia.

I was born at No. 1 Devonshire Place, Devonshire Terrace, almost immediately opposite St. Marylebone Church, on October 28, 1845; but as my father left there in 1851, having purchased Tavistock House, Tavistock Square, in that year, I have but little recollection of the events which occurred in the house in which I was born. An early reminiscence of the last-named house, showing the kindly thoughtfulness of my father, brings me at once into touch with that great continent of Australia from which I have recently returned. Shortly after my father had taken up his residence at Tavistock House there appeared upon the scene a crossing-sweeper in the shape of a small boy. He was about fourteen years of age, and was, I firmly believe, the original of poor Joe in "Bleak House," which was written, as many of my readers may recollect, in 1852. In order to make myself clear, I must explain that this house, with two others — one of which was occupied by Mr. Frank Stone, A.R.A. (father of the present talented artist, Mr. Marcus Stone, R.A.), and the other by a London merchant — stood within iron gates of its own. In front of these houses there was a considerable block of land, with a large carriage drive, and a flower-bed in the center. The boy-sweep made these houses his headquarters, keeping the pavements and the drive scrupulously clean. During the winter months, when the snow was upon the ground, he managed in some manner to collect little pieces of holly, mistletoe, etc., with which he decorated the barren flower-beds. After a time an intimacy sprang up between my father and the neglected lad, and Dickens, finding the boy honest, industrious, and intelligent, saw to it that the little chap got his meals in the kitchen of Tavistock House, and sent him to school at night. The boy got on wonderfully well "with his education, and when he came to be some seventeen years of age his benefactor procured for him a substantial outfit and sent him to the colony of New South Wales. It is satisfactory to know that the young man prospered well in his adopted country. After he had been in Australia some three years he wrote to his friend in England, thanking him for his kindness and telling him of his prosperity.

This is but one of many hundreds of similar actions which this warm-hearted man performed during his lifetime, and of which the world knew nothing. It may be truly said of him that he never let his left hand know what his right was doing.

THE BURIAL OF THE "IRON DUKE"

I can recollect without effort nearly everything that occurred in our family life at Tavistock House. One of my first and most vivid recollections takes me back to the burial of the Duke of Wellington, and I remember well the then butler at the house, John Thompson, wakening my brothers Frank and Sydney and myself at about three o'clock in the morning, and escorting us to the Household Words office, nearly opposite the Lyceum Theater in Wellington Street, where later on in the day most of the members of the family assembled, as well as a number of the authors and authoresses who were contributors to my father's periodical. The duke's burial was a most impressive ceremony, and I recollect as though it were yesterday our father calling the attention of us children to the duke's famous charger, Copenhagen, as he was led by in the procession.

THE ORIGINAL OF DOCTOR MARIGOLD

Departing for a moment from the chronological order of events, I may here mention that when the procession of the then Prince of Wales (afterward King Edward VII) and Prince Alexandra of Denmark passed along the Strand in March, 1863, my father, my aunt, Miss Georgina Hogarth, and myself were the sole occupants of the balcony on the first floor of the office of All the Year Round at the corner of Wellington and York streets. The vehicular traffic was as a matter of course all blocked in Wellington Street, and in front of us there was one huge mass of omnibuses, cabs, carriages, and large numbers of costermongers' carts.

On the top of one of the buses stood the conductor, or a London "cad," as many of them were then familiarly termed. He was a man brimful of natural wit and humor, and was doing the "cheapjack man" absolutely to perfection. He beguiled the time and kept the crowd, including my father, in roars of laughter.

At Christmas, 1865, in All the Year Round "Doctor Marigold's Prescriptions" appeared, and I think all readers of my father will agree with me that he never conceived a prettier little story than that of the deaf and dumb girl and the cheapjack, and he certainly never created or depicted a finer character or one more admirably drawn than that of Doctor Marigold. So great was the success of this number that in the first four days of issue, from December 20 to December 23, 1865, over two hundred and fifty thousand copies were sold — and this was at a time when readers were very few in number compared with those of the present day. Although my father was always very reticent as to the channels from which he drew his characters, and never, so far as I personally know, spoke to anyone definitely about them, yet I firmly believe his idea of Doctor Marigold germinated from that conductor on the memorable afternoon in March, 1863, when the prince and princess passed along the Strand.

That same evening my father had to go to a dinner-party in Westbourne Terrace, so toward nightfall he sent me to get a cab or hansom. I searched the Strand, Haymarket, Regent Street, and Leicester Square, but not a single vehicle of any description was procurable. I was returning in despair to the office when, outside the Lyceum Theatre, I sighted a solitary, well-appointed brougham. Upon getting into conversation with the coachman and explaining the predicament in which my father was placed, the coachman said, “Well, I do not expect my master will be back for about three-quarters of an hour, and as I would chance a good deal for Charles Dickens, I will drive him over.” When I told my father of what I had done, he expressed the opinion that I had a considerable amount of assurance, but he availed himself of the uses of the brougham nevertheless.

On the night of March 13, 1863, when the illuminations in honor of the prince and the princess took place, my father chartered a furniture-van, which he had fitted up with seats. At about nine o’clock at night we started with a joyous party from the office. In addition to the members of the family there were present, among others, Mr. and Mrs. John Forster, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Wills, Wilkie and Charley Collins, Mr. H.F. Chorley, (the then music critic of the Athenaeum), Mr. (afterward Mr. Justice) Chitty, celebrated in his college days as a great athlete, and very well known to the general public as having been for many years judge of the Oxford and Cambridge boat-races. We succeeded in getting passed across the Strand by the police, and all went well till we got safely under a railway arch close to London Bridge at about ten o'clock. The crush of vehicles of every possible description from that side of the river got hopelessly jumbled up, and I am not exaggerating when I say that the wheels of that wretched furniture-van never moved again till four o'clock in the morning. A few of the male members walked as far as London Bridge, which was beautifully illuminated, but when the party got back to the Strand at five or so, most of them had not seen anything at all, and were utterly miserable, hungry, and worn out.

A VANISHED HOUSE OF CHEER

The following evening my father, my eldest brother, Charley, myself, and two or three young men from the office (which I had just entered) started on foot from London Bridge, did the whole of the city and West End, and saw all that there was to be seen perfectly. When we had finished our walk, my father took the party to supper at Evans's famous supper-rooms in Covent Garden. The owner of these rooms at that time was a perfect character in himself, who was commonly known as Paddy Preen. He wore a wig which was painfully transparent to the naked eye, carried a most elaborate gold snuff-box, had manners which were really courtly and gracious, and dressed in exquisitely good taste. He knew well every celebrity in London, and whenever any one of them patronized his house, he invariably himself escorted the honored guest to an armchair in a sort of a library near the entrance doors. This was a most delightful spot in which to spend a couple of hours, for there every evening were rendered glees such as “The Chough and Crow” and “The Men of Harlech,” by choir-boys from Westminster Abbey and St. Paul’s. Then again, Herr Van Joel, another most original character, was, with his farmyard imitations and quaint German songs, always a leading attraction of the program. Would that the dear old place were still in existence, for since I returned to London last October I have not seen anything in the whole of this wonderful city to approach it for comfort and civility, or for orderliness and good nature on the part of its patrons.

During the years 1854 and 1855, and always commemorating Charley’s birthday, our most successful children’s theatricals took place. The pieces selected were Fielding’s burlesque “Tom Thumb,” and “Fortunio,” and in each of these my brother Harry (Henry Fielding Dickens, now the well-known K.C. and Recorder for Maidstone) most admirably sustained the name parts. Among the rest of the company were Mark Lemon, then editor of Punch, and his talented family.

Mark Lemon was one of the most delightful of men, and was always called by myself and my brothers and sisters “Uncle Mark.” He was just about the middle height, decidedly corpulent, with a grandly shaped head and a face brimful of vitality, good humor, and kindness — in short, just such a face as the editor of the most successful comic paper of the universe should have. He was a most excellent actor, and as the Giant in “Tom Thumb” and the Baron in “Fortunio” he was simply irresistible. Mrs. Lemon was a charming lady and a devoted mother, and as they lived in Gordon Place, only a stone’s throw from our house, the intimacy between the two families was very close and true.

DICKENS AS AN ACTOR

Included in the casts of both the above named pieces was Mr. Ainger, then on the verge of manhood, who became the well known preacher and canon of St. Paul’s Cathedral. He died, I am told, some five or six years ago. So admirably comic was his rendering of Villekins, and his Dinah in "Fortunio," that Thackeray, who was one of the audience, was so much convulsed with laughter that he rolled off his chair. Following on these children's revels came, in 1855, the celebrated grownup amateur theatricals. In that year "The Lighthouse," written by Wilkie Collins, was produced. The principal parts in this drama were sustained by my father, Mark Lemon, Augustus Egg, R.A., my aunt, Miss Georgina Hogarth, and my eldest sister, Mamie. In the farce, "Mr. Nightingale's Diary," which concluded the entertainment, in addition to the actors and actresses already named, my youngest sister, Kitty (Mrs. Carlo Perugini), also took part.

I may here mention that the scenery was painted by Mr. Clarkson Stanfield, R. A. (always familiarly known, to my father and his intimates, as Stanny). At the sale of the furniture and the effects at Gad Hill in the autumn of 1870, the drop-scene of the Eddystone Lighthouse realized one thousand guineas.

Thomas Carlyle, writing of my father's make-up as the lighthouse keeper in "The Lighthouse," likens it to the famous figure in Nicholas Poussin's Bacchanalian Dance in the National Gallery. At one of the suppers that followed on each night of the play, Lord Campbell told the company that he would much rather have written "Pickwick" than be Chief Justice of England and a peer of the realm.

At the end of 1856 my father turned his daughters' schoolroom at the back of Tavistock House into a charming little theater which he described as being the smallest theater in the world, and in January, 1857, "The Frozen Deep," written by Wilkie Collins, with elaborate scenery, was played by a very large cast. This proved the most successful of all the theatrical representations given. Of all the talented men and women who took part in these famed theatricals I think there are now only five living — viz., Mr. Marcus Stone, R.A., Mark Lemon, Jr., my aunt, Miss Georgina Hogarth, my youngest sister, now Mrs. Perugini, and Mr. Francesco Berger, who conducted the orchestra and composed the music incidental to the two pieces.

During 1857 my father heard with great grief of the death of his dear friend Douglas Jerrold. He died in indigent circumstances (through, I believe, the failure of some bank), and it was therefore decided at a meeting of his friends at the Punch office that my father should give two public readings of the "Christmas Carol" at St. Martin's Hall, W. M. Thackeray a lecture, and W. H. Russell, the celebrated war correspondent of the Times during the Crimean War, a lecture. Further representations of "The Frozen Deep" were also given by my father and Mark Lemon at the Gallery of Illustration and in the provinces, the only alterations in the cast being that in the country towns professional actors were substituted. A large amount of money was realized from these combined efforts, and invested for the benefit of Mrs. Jerrold and the family.

Her Majesty Queen Victoria, having heard so many favorable words about these theatricals, sent a request that a performance might be given for herself, the prince consort, and the court. This took place at the Gallery of Illustration in August, 1857, the only persons present besides the court being my mother and Hans Christian Andersen, who at that time was paying a long visit to Tavistock House and Gad's Hill. Gad's Hill had then just been purchased by my father.

Hans Christian Andersen was one of the most singular men I have ever met in my life. In appearance he was like an elongated Tom Pinch, with a lank, ungainly figure, and with all the simplicity of Tom. He was so unversed in the ways of the world that one could almost believe he had spent his life with the fairies of whom he wrote so charmingly. Once, when a cricket match was being played in the meadow at Gad's Hill, and a ball hit vigorously to square leg landed close to him, he fairly bolted and never stopped until he had accomplished a good three hundred or four hundred yards. He used to delight in making wreaths of very bright flowers, and one evening in the height of the hop-picking season, when the whole of the house-party were going for a stroll after dinner, he crowned Wilkie Collins with one of his wreaths, just as we were passing the Falstaff Inn, almost immediately opposite- Gad's Hill, where a large number of hop-pickers were sitting at the table in the porch. Poor Wilkie, to his intense disgust, had to run the gantlet of the pickers, who gibed and jeered at him to their hearts' content. My father, bringing up the rear, was, I remember very well, literally choking with laughter.

During the time we were in residence at Tavistock House my brother Frank (Francis Jeffery), next older in the family to myself, suffered from a very severe affection of stammering. Although my father at the time was working night and day at a very high pressure, he used to have Frank in his study every morning. He would read him a passage from Shakespeare, and then would make my brother Frank do the same thing over and over again, very slowly and very distinctly. Finally my father made a complete cure of him, and in later life in Canada, where Frank

Dickens reading to his daughters. Mamie and Katie, in the gardens of Gad's Hill. From boyhood the novelist had admired the place, but he did not own it until just a few years before his death held a high position in the Canadian Mounted Police force, he was described in the public press of that dependency as being a good and effective speaker. Frank, like my youngest sister, Katie (Mrs. Perugini), bore a striking resemblance in face, gesture, and manner to our father.

As I am writing just on the eve of the centenary of the birth of William Makepeace Thackeray, it is appropriate that I should make some reference to him in connection with my father. Many arguments have taken place in the past, and will in all probability be continued in the future, as to which of the two novelists was the greater writer. It has always appeared to me that it would be just as easy to compare Smollett or Fielding with Richardson, or Wordsworth and the Lake school of poetry with Lord Tennyson, as to compare these two writers whose modes of composition were so dissimilar, and whose characters were drawn from such different strata of society. Be that as it may, the fact remains that each writer had the most sincere and hearty admiration for the works of the other,

Charles Dickens in 1863, about the time he published "Great Expectations" which Swinburne considered his best work and the personal friendship, commenced in 1835, when Thackeray waited upon my father, offering himself as the illustrator of the "Pickwick Papers," lasted, with a very short intermission — for which neither of them was in any way personally to blame — till the death of Thackeray on Christmas Eve, 1863

At Thackeray's funeral at Kensal Green my father stood as chief mourner by the grave. I drove my father down in the basket carriage from Gad's Hill to Hinham railway station on the morning when he was going to London to the funeral, and I know how much distressed he was at the death of his old friend. Incompliance with requests received from all sides, my father wrote an "In Memoriam" of Thackeray for the Cornhill Magazine, which periodical Thackeray both started and edited. This short paper is, to my mind, so very beautiful, so true, and so sympathetic, without the slightest degree fulsome, that I will venture to give a few short extracts from it here, more especially as I think they may be new to many of the readers of this magazine. The article was published in the Cornhill Magazine in February, 1864. Charles Dickens writes: "We had our differences of opinion. I thought that he too much feigned a want of earnestness and that he made a pretense of underrating his art, which was not good for the art that he held in trust. But when we fell upon these topics, it was never very gravely, and I have a lively image of him in my mind twisting both his hands in his hair and stamping about, laughing, to make an end of the discussion." Then further on he says: "He had a particular delight in boys, and an excellent way with them. I remember his once asking me with fantastic gravity, when he had been to Eton, where my eldest son then was, whether I felt as he did in regard of never seeing a boy without instantly wanting to give him a sovereign, and I thought of this when I looked down in his grave, after he had been laid there, for I looked down into it over the shoulder of a boy to whom he had been very kind."

My father's article went on: "He was only in his fifty-third year, so young a man that the mother who blessed him in his first sleep blessed him in his last. Twenty years before he had written, after being in a white squall:

And when, its force expended.
The harmless storm was ended,
And as the sunrise splendid
Came blushing o'er the sea,
I thought, as day was breaking,
My little girls were waking
And smiling and making
A prayer at home for me.

These little girls had grown to be women when the mournful day broke which saw their father lying dead. In those twenty years of companionship with them, they had learned much from him, and one of them has a literary career before her, worthy of her famous name. On the bright wintry day⁴ the last but one of the old year, he was laid in his grave at Kensal Green, there to mingle the dust to which the mortal part of him had returned with that of a third child, lost in her infancy years before. The heads of a great concourse of his fellow workers were bowed in grief around."

My father in his article refers to Thackeray's eldest daughter, Anne, now Lady Ritchie, the authoress of "The Story of Elizabeth," "The Village on the Cliff," "Old Kensington," and several other delightful novels. Since early girlhood a firm and lasting friendship has existed between Lady Ritchie and my youngest sister, Katie. There is a charming little poem of Thackeray's, the last he wrote, I believe, that was presented by him shortly before his death to my sister, who had been from childhood a great ally of both his own daughters. The gift of a pretty, quaint old lantern accompanied the verses, and engraved upon the pane were her initials, K and E — Katherine Elizabeth.

A LARK WITH THACKERAY IN BOULOGNE

When my brothers, Frank and Sydney, and myself were at school at Boulogne, Thackeray upon one occasion, which I shall never forget, called and took us for an outing. He made us row him up the Liane to the Pont de Briques, where we had tea. Then on our return he fed us with pastry at the fashionable pastry-cook's in the town (I went over specially a month ago to Boulogne to look at that and other well-loved spots), and finally, when we got back to the school, solemnly presented each of us with a napoleon, thus practising his doctrine as to how schoolboys should be treated. He was indeed most charming to us boys, and that was a red-letter day in our lives, never, never to be forgotten.

MY FATHER AS I RECALL HIM BEST

I cannot, I think, conclude these detached reminiscences better than by giving a short sketch of the personal characteristics of Charles Dickens in the year 1860. In this year he decided to live permanently at Gad's Hill. He was then fifty years of age, about the middle height, with his hair just grizzled with gray. His face was full of life and intellect. His bright, piercing eyes were very thoughtful and dreamy looking at times, but seemed always to be able to look you through and through. His eyes were a true index to his character. Leigh Hunt said of him: "What a face is his to meet in a drawing-room! It has the life in it of fifty human beings"; and Carlyle, referring to the fineness of his features, said, "It seems to me as though his face were cutout of steel." His features were far too sensitive, however, to be likened to so hard and unsympathetic a substance. He was the kindest, most thoughtful, and most considerate of fathers, and he was one of the most charming hosts it is possible to conceive. While he had a fund of anecdote and humor, he was never in the least pedantic or bookish in his talk, and if anyone referred to himself or his books, he invariably in a very pleasant way turned the conversation into another channel.

As in his public and professional life he laid down for himself the golden rule that "Whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing well," so in his private life he was the most methodical and orderly of men. He could not bear to see anything out of its place. If a book was removed from the library, he looked for the borrower to return it immediately it was done with. I recollect once when I was going to drive with him in the basket carriage to Gravesend to meet either Mr. Spiers or Mr. Pond {I forget which of these two gentlemen it was), who was coming over to see him about the contemplated Australian reading, I was busily

A LETTER RECEIVED BY A. TENNYSON DICKENS TWO DAYS AFTER

HIS FATHERS DEATH — JUNE 9, 1870

My Dear Alfred,

I have just time to tell you under my own hand that I invited Mr. Bear to a dinner of such guests as he would naturally like to see; and that we took to him very much, and got on with him capitally.

I am doubtful whether Plorn is taking to Australia. Can you find out his real mind? I notice that he always writes as if his present life were the be-all and the end-all of his emigration; and as if he had no idea of you two becoming proprietors, and aspiring to the first positions in the Colony, without casting off the old connection.

From Mr. Bear I had the best accounts of you. I told him that they did not surprise me, for I had unbounded faith in you. For which take my love and blessing. They will have told you all the news here, and that I am hard at work. This is not so much a letter as an assurance that I never think of you without hope and comfort.

Ever, my dear Alfred,

Your affectionate Father,

Athenaeum Club,

Friday Night, 20 May, 1870.

A recent portrait of Alfred Tennyson Dickens, one of the two surviving sons of the novelist, who went to Australia in 1865. where he received the above letter from his father two days after the latter's death at Gad's Hill, June 9, 1870. Mr. Dickens has left Australia for England, and was recently in this country lecturing on his distinguished father engaged brushing my coat in the dining-room, instead of outside. He happened to come in just at the moment, and I never by any chance committed that particular offense afterward.

In everything pertaining to food and drink he was the most careful and abstemious of men. Mr. Fields, of Ticknor & Fields, the Boston publishers, described him exactly when he said: "He was accustomed to talk and write a good deal about eating and drinking, but I have rarely seen a man drink or eat less. He liked to dilate in imagination over the brewing of a bowl of punch, but when the punch was brewed, he drank less of it than anyone who might be present." It was the sentiment of the thing and not the thing itself that engaged his attention. He was wonderfully good and even tempered, although, as may be easily imagined, of a nervous and excitable temperament. If he did allow his temper to get the better of him for a few moments, which, however, he very rarely ever did, then, like the sun after a passing summer shower, all the most lovable traits of his most lovable character shone out to greater advantage afterward.

That is the Charles Dickens of my loving recollection. In 1865 I went to Australia, and I never saw him again. Five years later, when I was managing a large station property in the north of New South Wales, news came to me by cablegram of my father's death at Gad's Hill. Two days afterward there reached me a letter — one of the last letters from his hand.

Editor's Note. — This intimate article from the pen of Mary Angela Dickens, granddaughter of the great novelist and herself a novelist and essayist of wide note, narrating her memories and impressions of her famous grandfather, constitutes one of the most interesting contributions to Dickens literature that has yet been given to the world. This is the second article on Charles Dickens giving new points of view on the life of the great Victorian by relatives and close personal friends.

My Grandfather as I Knew Him

By Mary Angela Dickens

THE great place which my grandfather holds in my memory — and few people could realize how great it is — is filled by an immense personality, a personality so dominating that it affected everything and everybody with whom it came in contact; that the world in which he moved, so to speak, existed only in order that he might so move at his good pleasure.

All my personal recollections of my grandfather — all but one, that is to say — belong to his last and best loved home, Gad's Hill — my own home for years after his death. Most people know the story of his childish love and admiration for the house, how, as "a very queer small boy," he used to walk from his home in Chatham to stand and look at it, and how he resolved that in some far-off and utterly inexplicable future he would himself live in it.

It was on March 14th, four years before his death, that he wrote: "This day I have paid the purchase-money for Gad's Hill Place. After drawing the check I turned round to give it to Wills, and said: 'Now, isn't it an extraordinary thing — look at the day — Friday! I have been nearly drawing it half a dozen times, when the lawyers have not been ready, and here it comes round upon a Friday, as a matter of course!'" Friday, in his opinion, was his lucky day, and certainly it was a lucky day indeed which put him in possession of the home that became so dear to him.

His great delight — very significant of his restless and inventive mind — was to make improvements in his property. One of the first was the sinking of a well and the installing of a horse-pump, and in connection with this work he writes in September the following delightfully resigned appreciation of the methods of the British workman, "Five men have been looking attentively at the pump for a week, and (I should hope) may begin to fit it in the course of October." In addition to the pump, came a new drawing-room, two bedrooms, and a rearrangement of the ground floor. Whenever an improvement was completed his younger daughter, who lived in London, and who was often at Gad's Hill, used to come down and inspect, and on each and every occasion my grandfather would say to her, very seriously and in the utmost good faith, "No, Katie, you behold your parent's latest and last achievement." One of the achievements was the lining of the walls and doors of the drawing-room with mirrors, and on this occasion my younger aunt, laughing at him, said, "I believe, papa, that when you become an angel your wings will be made of looking-glass and your crown of scarlet geraniums."

Scarlet geraniums were my grandfather's favorite flowers, and the garden of Gad's Hill blazed with them when the master lay there dead.

It was indeed a "last improvement" that gave him one of the final pleasures of his life. This was a conservatory which opened into both dining-room and drawing-room; "Glass and iron," as he described it, "brilliant but expensive, with foundations as of an ancient work of horrible solidity." On the last Sunday before his death he saw it first in a completed state, and he said to his daughter, who had come from town on purpose to see it, "Well, Katie, now you see positively the last improvement at Gad's Hill!" It was the repetition of the old joke,

A unique portrait of Charles Dickens made in 1867 and everybody laughed, not knowing that it was in sober truth the very last.

To write of Gad's Hill is not easy to me, because I grew up there, and I loved it. But even in those later days, at an age when youth is least impressionable, the memory of my grandfather which it held was always one of its charms for me — though at the time a somewhat terrible charm. I had heard my father speak of his arrival at the house on the morning of that 9th of June, of how he sat, I think with Katie, on the steps of the conservatory later in the day, waiting for the inevitable end. The scent of syringa was heavy in the air, and my father would never have the flower near him afterward. Consequently there were certain places which were always haunted for me, and as year after year the 9th of June came round and dinner was served anywhere — in the large square hall, in the garden, in the library — but in the dining-room, the impression remained always fresh.

MY GRANDFATHER'S WORK-ROOM

My recollections of Gad's Hill during my grandfather's lifetime are all, except one, of winter weather. I remember going with my great-aunt to the chalet, probably to renew the flowers which always stood upon his table, and the leaves were green about the little place, and the sun shone in, and the birds were singing. This is the only recollection I have of going into the chalet, which I regarded with awe as a place where mysterious doings took place, but I can see the room in which my grandfather wrote as clearly at this moment as though I had just stepped out of it. This chalet was sent to him by Fechter, the actor, in ninety-four pieces, which had to be put together like a puzzle. My grandfather wrote of it:

"I have put five mirrors in the chalet where I write, and they reflect and refract, in all kinds of ways, the leaves that are shivering at the windows, the great fields of waving corn, and the sail-dotted river. My room is up among the branches of the trees, and the birds and the butterflies fly in and out, and the green branches shoot in at the open window, and the lights and shadows of the clouds come and go with the rest of the company. The scent of the flowers, and indeed of everything that is growing for miles and miles, is most delicious."

His remarkable tidiness — apparent in all his doings, and insisted upon throughout his household — was nowhere more apparent than in the arrangement of his writing-table. There were certain little objects which he always took with him when he changed his quarters for any length of time, and these were invariably set out in the same order and with the most absolute precision. In one of his letters he alludes with much satisfaction to having performed this ceremony immediately on his arrival at one of his temporary homes.

I have been told that my grandfather took pleasure in having my little brother and myself trotting beside him as he walked about the place, and that as a very minute child with a very large muff which involved great solemnity of demeanor, I appealed to his sense of humor. Remembering some of his letters to children, that seems quite possible. I can distinctly recollect the thrill of speechless delight with which I received a message in a letter from America, thanking me for some violets which he had received as coming from me. I hope I sent them, and I always wish I could remember doing so. But honesty obliges me to say that I do not. It is one of my regrets that he never wrote to me.

Four distinct pictures of my grandfather hold their places in my memory, and, oddly enough, each one of the four reflects more or less definitely a different phase of his many-sided character.

A CHRISTMAS DINNER AT GAD'S HILL

In the first I see the dining-room at Gad's Hill, and a large dinner-party in progress. It is very gay and very glittering, many flowers, much glass, much silver, and everyone is in great good humor. I think it must be Christmas Day, as I can imagine no other reason for the presence on the scene of my little brother and myself. My little brother — a mere mite, a great favorite and innocent of the "seen and not heard" adage — said or did something which caught my grandfather's attention. I can see the figure at the head of the table standing with his glass in his hand, alert, laughing, full of the zest of the moment, and pausing for an instant to say something to the little boy — something which I probably did not understand, and certainly do not remember — which was received with peals of laughter, in which the child joined gleefully without the faintest idea what it was all about! Here then is the social Charles Dickens, the delightful companion whose friends invariably forgot that he had ever written anything, so great was the charm of his capacity for enjoyment, so great was his gift for causing those about him to enjoy. He talked well, because he was so full of spirit, and so keenly observant, and because his sense of humor was wholly irrepressible. But he never talked other than naturally and unaffectedly, and he was never bookish.

My second picture always makes me smile a little. It reminds me of a passage in one of his letters from America — containing a phrase, “a ‘cream of joy,” much quoted in the long ago by my aunt. “There is a child in this house,” he wrote, “a little girl, to whom I presented a black doll when I was last here. When you sent it up to me by the colored boy,’ she said after receiving it, ‘I gave such a ‘cream that ma came running in and ‘creamed too, ‘cos she felt I’d hurt myself. But I ‘creamed a ‘cream of joy.’ She had a friend to play with her that day, and brought the friend with her — to my infinite confusion. A friend all stockings and much too tall, who sat on the sofa with her stockings sticking stiffly out in front of her, and glared at me, and never spoke a word. Dolly found us confronted in a sort of fascination like serpent and bird.”

Now I hope I need not apply to myself the description of the friend — I was certainly not too tall, and I wore socks. I also hope I did not glare. But in my second picture, my grandfather and I are certainly confronting one another with an awful fascination. My grandfather is standing in front of a red and roaring fire — again in the dining-room at Gad's Hill. There is a very high and a very narrow mantelpiece, and he is framed, so to speak, against the background of cheery flame. On either side of the fireplace is a window, through which the garden, covered with snow, can be seen. My grandfather, handsome, alert, but for the moment a little at a loss, looks down at me. I, a very small girl in a pinafore, look up at him. And I am afraid I emulate the friend, inasmuch as I never speak a word! For it is an occasion, and I have been sent into the room, alone, with the impression strong upon me that something tremendous is going to happen to me — my grandfather is going to give me a Christmas present himself. The present was one of the few children's annuals of those days — the "Child's Prize," and I do not doubt that my aunt had bought it, and had asked him to perform the ceremony of its bestowal. And my grandfather either was not in spirits that morning, or else my preternatural solemnity seemed to demand a return in kind. So there we stood, the presentation being made, and I always wonder how the interview closed! It seems that it might have gone on interminably.

My grandfather's charm in a sick-room is well known, but I must emphasize it, because it forms the frame-work of my third picture. On one of my visits to Gad's Hill, running about where I should not have been allowed to go, I fell over a sauce-pan of boiling water. Dinner was going on, and my nurse, frightened at the result of her shortcomings, dared not disturb my aunt, and accordingly put me to bed, and told me not to cry! My aunt, coming to see me after dinner, instantly discovered my unhappy plight, but to my astonishment it was my grandfather who appeared at my bedside and "made me better." And through the unhappy days that followed — for I was badly scalded — the faith that he would always "make me better" never left me.

In the course of those days he had to go to London, and my childish misery was great. I "hurt dreadfully," no one knew how much, and no one could possibly know, until "Venerables" — our childish name for him — came back. I can remember the joy of hearing the pony-carriage which brought him from the station drive into the yard, and can see him, almost immediately afterward, coming into the room to me — a little invalid, waiting in perfect confidence to be “made better.”

Of my grandfather’s art as a reader I have, of course, nothing to say, though my last picture of him is at one of his readings. Everything possible has been said many times over by those well qualified to speak. But I like much to think of his most personal delight in his success and the manner in which he bore himself under it. Says Mr. Forster: “Of his hearty, undisguised, and unmistakable enjoyment of his astonishing and indeed quite bewildering popularity, there can be as little doubt as that there was not a particle of vanity in it, any more than of false modesty. . . . Few men in the world, one fancies, could have gone through such grand displays of fireworks, not merely with so marvelous an absence of what the French call pose, but unsoiled by the smoke of a cracker. No man’s strong individuality was ever so free from conceit.” These words were written in connection with what Mr. Forster calls “the universal blazing up of America.” But my grandfather loved his less sensational English popularity quite as dearly. It was the personal note, the personal affection, always, that appealed to him. It was my father, I think, who was determined that I should be taken to one of the last series of readings; and he very naturally chose for me the “Christmas Carol.” Curiously enough, I was not in the least elated at such an unusual form of “treat” — I think the necessity for being very good must have been unduly impressed upon me! But I never went into the St. James’s Hall in after years without looking at the place where I sat on that occasion, and feeling again the half-frightened expectation of I knew not what, which I felt then. I see my grandfather now, as I saw him then, standing at the little table, not “Venerables” at all, but a terrible and unknown personage, a long way off, quite unaware of my existence and speaking in unknown voices. And I count among the most dreadful moments of my childish existence the moment when “Venerables” cried.

There is an element of distress in my last picture, but there is a smile in it, too. And I am always glad I have it — that I have that one impression of my grandfather in connection with the public that loved him, and loves him still. I think there is no man for whom has been so fully answered the prayer which he himself wrote in “The Haunted Man,” “Lord, keep my memory green!”

MEN AND MEMORIES: PERSONAL REMINISCENCES

DICKENS

It was during Tribune days, in 1867, that Charles Dickens made his second visit to the United States. Of that event, and his subsequent friendship with Dickens, Mr. Young wrote a few years since, the following article:

CHARLES DICKENS AS I KNEW HIM

I have been reading in a recent number of the New York Times a narrative of Richard B. Kimball, author of "St. Leger," to whom our literature is indebted for so much that is useful, of the two visits of Dickens to the United States, — that is to say, in 1842 and in 1867-8. In regard to the second visit, Mr. Kimball writes without that fulness of information requisite to the entire value of his narrative. I saw much of Mr. Dickens when in the United States, — was his friend and became somewhat in correspondence with him. He rests with me as a memorable figure. What Mr. Kimball has so gracefully written may justify me in recalling some memories of the man as I saw and knew him.

It was one snowy Saturday afternoon in December, 1867, as I place the date, when I found myself in the dingy editorial rooms of the Tribune, under engagement to dine with Horace Greeley. He had letters to write and I was to await his leisure. There were no Sunday newspapers in those days, and the editorial rooms were deserted. Greeley in a small ante-room writing, nothing better to do than to pace up and down in front of the worn desks of Ripley, Bayard Taylor, Winter and Clarence Cook, look out upon the snow and watch the falling in of the night. A desolate, sobbing day; all nature under drifts of the ghastly deadening snow; the park as bleak as a bit of Nova Zembla. Mr. Greeley's own invaluable Dennis, drowsing in the corner in attendance, awaiting to take the mail, brought me word that a person below named Dickinson desired to see me. I had a profuse knowledge of Dickinson; recall him as an enthusiast in patents; had several machines with a vital money-evolving principle, which had only to go, to make the world go with it, when he would build colleges, and in other ways elevate and bless mankind. There was, however, a conspiracy to rob him, and the only way to defeat it was by elaborate expositions in the press. Dickinson was a weary, dreary, cheerful, sanguine soul, whom I had avoided with assiduity. So when his name was given, my impulse was to ask Dennis to rid me of him, with as little burden to his conscience as possible. The afternoon, however, was shuddering in its dreariness — skies dark as despair — and perhaps poor, sanguine, cheerful Dickinson had a new idea, and anyhow it would be a kindness to see him. Moreover, Greeley was scratching away, and no knowing how long that process would run, and time had to go, and better the Dickinson enthusiasm than being alone with the sombre night. In a few moments up the stairs and out of the shadows came a furred figure, sprinkled with snowflakes; ruddy, teeming cheeks glistening with snow, which whitened a full and already frosty beard. A very Kris Kringle stepped out of his sleigh, who shook hands in the clasped, hearty American fashion, as his companion, Osgood of Boston, famous bookseller then as now, introduced him as, —

CHARLES DICKENS!

I was living at the time in bachelor quarters on Irving Place, Mr. Greeley likewise with chambers in there, and Dickens at the Westminster a few doors above. The next morning, while shoveling together some newspaper work and arranging for the day, Dickens came in with hardly the formality of a card — came in, as it seemed, almost tumbling over the maid servant who announced him. He had only heard — how jolly — had only heard from Palmer, friend of both (his hotel keeper), that Mr. Greeley lived so near. We could be neighborly, and all that! He was so sorry to hear that Greeley had gone to his country place, as he wanted to say to him — he was not sure he had said with due emphasis the night before, but it was something that he must say — how grateful he was for the very great kindness the Tribune had done him, — how much he appreciated it and how much it had to do with his coming. And this Greeley should know, and I should know, and he could not be at peace until it was well understood. I have tried to recall the special incident which had impressed Dickens, and to which I owed a valued and memorable friendship. I believe some foolish story, disparaging his motives in coming to this country, that they were vulgar and mercenary, had floated over. Picked up in some London coffee room, some foolish truculent imagination had magnified it to the chagrin of Dickens, and the Tribune had set it right. I remember Fields, of Boston coming one afternoon in a mood of dismay, with a cable or a letter from Dickens, then in London — cable, I think — to the effect that the story was despicable, and must be stamped out. It was a pleasure and a duty so to do; would have been done for one less estimable than Dickens. However, he must come and say how deeply the incident had impressed him, and how handsomely Greeley had behaved.

It was a long call! Dickens, with many apologies for breaking in, would run away if I gave a hint, for he knew the value of Time. If I gave a hint! This royal visitor from the land of romance, the master and king, his presence making the atmosphere sovereign. If I gave a hint! The eager, joyous man, with those fine, gleaming eyes, and how he tossed at once into journalism, had had deplorable days at it, could not endure the day in and day out never ending grind, asked me a hundred questions about journalism in New York. They were direct, leading, thorough, — questions about pay, the division of labor, the powers of the editor, our relations with public men and affairs, and all that pertained to the inside economics and ethics of the press. If I knew aught of journalism which was not bestowed upon Dickens the fault did not rest with him. The effect of the war upon journalism interested him, the white paper problem and the imminence of the cable. He saw with his discerning eyes what the cable meant. “Farewell to the adjectives,” I said. “Yes,” he replied, “to the adjectives and adverbs and all the horticulture of newspaper genius.” The relations of the editor to the business departments were strange, and especially when I said that I could not see how such a relation as that of Delane to the Times would be permitted in the New York press. “Ah!” he said, “your newspapers are properties. Ours are institutions. The editor, as we understand him, with his royal attributes and powers, will come to you with time, as many other things will come. There can be no real editor without it, and no true journalism where the editorial prerogatives are impaired.”

I must tell him, too, about our report of his first reading in Boston. How could it have possibly been done. Straggling, ragged, rubbishy, hysterical, jerked narratives in other papers, and here a perfect essay, written with the grace and finish of Addison. And yet it was late before he had finished his reading, and this must have been telegraphed to New York, hundreds of miles away.

The report to which Dickens referred, and at the time a memorable newspaper event, would be quite an obvious incident now, and hardly worth the telling except to note the advance in journalism. When Dickens came to Boston it seemed that the one only thing that could be done was to report his first night in a manner worthy of his genius and his fame. I took counsel with Clarence Cook, then as now one of the most accomplished and graceful writers in American journalism, and laid my purpose before him. That he must hear the reading, that he must absorb the color and incident, and going to the telegraph write it with all the care and style possible, even marking where the paragraphs belonged, and aim in the whole narrative for striking, finished rhetorical effect. This was the time when telegraph tolls were dear and condensation was the rule. Cook accepted the mission, and that done there should be absolute secrecy. Once it was known that a writer of his eminence were to do the work, and other writers would be sent from our rivals, and there would be a competition of rhetoric. My hope was that the first Dickens night in Boston would be treated by our rivals as an ordinary news reporter incident, a street affray or an elopement. I am afraid that to encourage that hope one of the most indifferent of our police news reporters was sent to Boston with some show of ostentation, at least there was no instruction that his mission should not be the theme of the nearest beer saloon. Cook went to Boston. No one knew of his errand but myself. His despatch was, of course, the only one used. I remember it as a masterpiece of brilliant composition, so far beyond any other report that comparison was useless. In this idle, little story, Dickens was profoundly interested, said that the journalism of England could not have surpassed the story of Mr. Cook, and it was not alone because of the compliment to himself, but as a step forward in journalism that he valued it. "If we only knew how narrow the distance between the good and bad in our craft," he said, "and that the one is almost as easy as the other — if we only knew it."

This was the first of what were to be many meetings with Dickens, and how clearly it stands before me. The hearty, easy, direct, spontaneous, cheery man, with those sovereign, searching eyes. Yet, somehow it was a disappointment. There was something about Dickens that I did not like; that deterred me, as it were. His genius I had held in sovereign reverence. How much he had been to my life, as he had been to so many millions in those innocent believing days. No spirit from the infinite reaches of our love and hopes and dreams, not even Byron, or Shakespeare, or Burns, could have been more welcome. And here, even here, in my chamber — to look into the eyes that had seen Agnes and Micawber and Little Nell — to hear the very tones of his voice that had given the world so many precious lessons of joy and hope. Why the very gods were dowering me with Olympian splendor. In soul I long had worshipped Dickens, and if I could have made worship then and there, it would have come from my soul. But somehow I did not like Dickens. Here he was, but where were the illusions? Can the fancy never be satisfied? Are our idols ever to have the feet of clay, and men never to be what they seem? What was it? Something awkward, unnatural. Could it be that certain condescension of the foreigner toward Americans about which Mr. Lowell has written an essay? There was no want of heartiness nor tact, nor came there between us any point of controversy. He seemed restless, artificial, like one on his guard; began his sentences as though he had been waiting a cue; was acting rather than talking. There was an impression of showiness, and the thought came over me, how much more agreeable the man would be if one could only see the man. There was now and then what seemed to be an effort to adapt himself to circumstances, to be entirely agreeable, to seek themes that would interest or please me, so that instead of being spoken to, as man to man, I began to feel as if I were being caressed, soothed, being put quite at my ease.

I dwell upon this strange impression, because it is a part of my memory of Dickens, and because it was so soon to pass away. I spoke to Greeley of it when we met in the evening, and I gave him the various messages of Dickens, spoke perhaps with disappointment, as I recall Greeley's remark, that such a manner was almost inseparable from such a fame. "This having to live ever in full dress," he said, "plays the devil with one's deeper and better personality." It was soon to pass away, and I came to know Dickens as the most natural of men, simple, direct, straightforward, with the very gaiety of genius. Among the messages which Dickens left was that Greeley and I should come and dine with him at his rooms, the next evening. When we arrived we saw there had been some mistake. Dickens had named one hour for the dinner and ordered it for an earlier hour, and we found in his manner the dismay which comes with the consciousness of cooling soup. There was the hour noted in a pencil scrawl by Dickens himself. How well I recall his laughing self-condemnation, his walking across the room and striking the table to make his remark more emphatic. "It is always a mistake to give a friend a verbal invitation and not confirm it with a written note confirming time, day, place, hour and minute. Then there can be no mistake. I always do it in London; always insist upon friends doing it, and then "you are sure to be right." Boythorn himself could not have been more amusingly boisterous as he arraigned himself for this neglected duty and laughingly pointed us to our seats.

I could write of many meetings, but one evening, when we had been at Delmonico's with Greeley and two or three friends, and together walked home. There was just a film of snow and in the air a keen invitation for a walk, a challenge I was never loath to accept. Dickens lingered a minute at the door of his hotel. It was so fine a night, even with the melting streets and the snowy clouds, that it was a sin not to do it honor. So out and around Gramercy Park and toward Third Avenue — "Your Tottenham Court road," as he called it. I do not know how far we walked, recall ourselves near the far end of the park, and looking sharply to see that we were on our way. He spoke of his books with simplicity; like "Copperfield," could hardly understand my enthusiasm over "Bleak House," wished I had seen more in the "Tale of Two Cities," to which he had given his best work. However, I had not then been in France, and I would comprehend what he was striving to say when I saw France. I was to see France, indeed, and to know the truth of the master's own criticism.

Dickens craved all I knew of Lincoln, said Carpenter's book on Lincoln had taken a night from him, and that there was something weird about Lincoln — a fascination. He had met Stanton and admired his strength, and told me that the Secretary could repeat pages from his works. I recalled what Stanton had once told me, that during the war, when he was harried and worn with his superhuman struggles, his invariable source of comfort was Arthur Helps' "Friend in Council." "What Helps?" exclaimed Dickens. And this I had to repeat to him, until it was fixed in his mind so that Helps might hear of it — "there being," he said, "no truer man in England." I was coy about Thackeray, and cannot recall any opinion from Dickens as to his rival. He seemed to dwell upon Irving and Poe among American authors; was disappointed when I referred to Irving as the genius of his own generation, rather dimming under new conditions. Dickens could not see how we should rise above the high-water mark of the genius of Irving. The compliments paid by Dickens to American authors seemed as if given rather in a general spirit of compliment, with no attempt at analysis or criticism. He doubted if there were any more growth in Poe, fearing that years with conservatism would have dwarfed rather than developed his genius. People, however, he thought, could not very well write books and plant trees, and no critic, however severe, should be impatient with America.

I am afraid it was in a sense disappointing that Dickens did not share in some of my own foolish literary enthusiasms. He was quick with sketching outlines of whoever came into our talk — Tennyson, Moore, Browning, Shelley, Wordsworth and the rest. Each one limned as alone the master could do it. When I came to inspect my company of heroes, as retouched by Dickens, they did not seem improved. There was scarcely a remembrance or an estimate that did not have what I may call a sting. “Yes, yes, quite so — but,” and with the “but” would come anecdote, phrase, epithet or comment — brilliant, grotesque, irresistibly amusing. So my poor heroes had little good, in my eyes, from the Dickens touch. Illusions vanished. Harmonies became discords. The gods wore wooden shoes after all. We could hear the patter of their feet and their garments were not sound. The judgments were those of a just and true man. I have never questioned them. Over against my modest Pantheon the Dickens decrees must rest, never to be disturbed by any appellate tribunal.

A notable exception was Carlyle, and especially Mrs. Carlyle. “Carlyle, yes — but Mrs. Carlyle!” he would say. “Old Carlyle,” he said; “what a man. I was reading the Trial shortly before I left London, and while doing the Buzfuz speech became conscious of peal after peal of laughter, that seemed to come from some cavern below the stage. It was so noticeable that people in the audience began to laugh likewise. I could not make out the source, but in the course of the declamation managed to edge toward the end of the platform. There, sure enough, on the first bench was old Carlyle, head bent and wagging, laughing peal upon peal, and muttering, ‘Buzfuz, Buzfuz, oh, Buzfuz.’ It was by the severest restraint that I could keep from laughing, too, and breaking down in my work.” Of Carlyle, Dickens never spoke but with tenderness, enthusiasm and affection, and of Mrs. Carlyle as among the most gifted women he had ever known.

I have heard famous talkers, — Greeley when in vehement mood; Grant when among his friends, say at one in the morning; Conkling, with a grievance, Bismarck, Beaconsfield, — have been under the spell of perhaps the most exquisite of all, even the silvery spell of Wendell Phillips; have talked with Tribune Smalley and Gen. Sherman, Robert Ingersoll and Henry George, but the talk of Dickens was unique, an art in itself. The supreme dramatic power, dramatic expression in repose, as in Wendell Phillips; his way of settling himself in the chair as his narrative proceeded, head rather bent forward, the eye archly turned upon you, partly sidewise, glancing with its ascending look, as if studying the effect. This is as I recall him. A Dickens story was ever finished and minute. Occasionally an effort at mimicry, as when I heard him once describe Carlyle's unconscious self-communing, description in the broadest Scotch, of some other one at the table, as "a puir, feckless creature," but not as a general thing mimetic. No contrasts or surprises, or odd fancies so often summoned for conversational effect. Yet at times the humor of the man would stream, and picture after picture 'would be thrown at you, as though he were some wandering silhouette artist at a county fair. One occasion, for instance, when he had returned from Philadelphia and we met at dinner, a handful of Philadelphians, whom I knew, and about whom I made friendly inquiry, were each one sketched in an airy, bantering way. Mr. Childs, among others, a graceful etching, reminding Dickens, as he stood at his carriage, of one of his characters in his books — name escaped me; a quizzical sketch of DuChaillu, somehow his heart going out to the gorillas as he approached the famous explorer; the boys that would trail after Tennyson, as if ever boys were born that could help trailing after such a cloak and hat — an invitation to boys quite irresistible in its way; a solemn quizzing of Sumner, whom he admired, yet as if he were afraid he would surprise himself when he was with the Senator and forget to be solemn; little bits of portraiture, vivid, acute, as though drawn upon the thumb-nail, would flutter out of his talk, and keep alive your wonder at the incessant genius.

"Shakespeare with some threads of the negro minstrel running through him," as Shelton Mackenzie said to me of Dickens in an impatient mood, endeavoring to forget, I fancy, some frailty in the way of recognition on the part of Dickens in London. A tendency to showiness, personal decoration, scarfs and pins, and other bits of innocent adornment. This, I presume, is what Mackenzie meant; and although I could see no reason for the criticism in New York — as I have read of no reason why it should have applied in London — yet Dickens, as I knew him, might be called a somewhat overdressed man. In this, however, he had preserved what we read of the manners of Bulwer, Disraeli and the brilliant young bucks who came after Alvanley, Brummel and Byron. If there was an exuberant tone in Dickens it belonged to his nature. If we are never older than we feel, as I have read in the pages of some consoling French philosopher, Dickens was a young man, even at fifty-six, when I knew him. I should say among the youngest of my friends. His face seemed free from care. Sorrow had kneaded no lines around those radiant eyes. A very living human man, amenable to comforts, putting aside, at least not without inquiry, whatever the world might bring him in the way of sensation and experience; a hearty, wholesome man, who as he came swinging into your room seemed redolent with life; to have exacted tribute from nature whatever her mood; and if he could not bring the scents of the clover field, to reek with the fallen rain or the stern blustering winds.

I had a good deal to do with the famous dinner to Dickens, now recorded in his works; found myself in a sea of trouble before I was well out of it. Some of us, the working press people, met one day at the Park Hotel to talk it over. The thing to do was to dine Dickens. Assuredly, but would he come? Among my fellows in a small way an authority upon Dickens, knowing him at all events, when appealed to was compelled to say that I did not believe he would come. His one refrain when we had met, that he was in America for reading work, and all else must give way. An occasional dinner, under the rose, as it were, to Greeley or some definite favored one, — well, that would not count. As working newspaper men, in presence of a working newspaper man whom we would honor, there would be no harm in asking him to dine. The invitation went from Croly in due form. Dickens was not only willing, but eager. It was the one invitation that he could and would accept — only let the dinner be on the eve of his going away! And thus it fell, that on the Saturday night preceding his departure, he dined with his newspaper friends at Delmonico's, on Fourteenth street, no banquet in my remembrance more notable and brilliant.

I was chairman of the committee that arranged the dinner. Charles E. Wilbour was a member. Wilbour, then a Tribune shareholder, and spasmodic writer — a thorough, scholarly man, who had won fame as the translator of "Les Miserables," and was to go off into the fascinations of Egyptology, and to become a professor of hieroglyphics on the Nile — where I vainly tried to find him some months ago. D. G. Croly, manager of the World, a quaint man of genius, striving ever in a whirlpool of ideas; kind, appreciative, angular, with strange formulas of governing mankind upon some Ollendorff plan of learning the philosophies in six easy lessons. Sheppard, of the Times, a steady headed Canadian, then right hand to Raymond, and for a small space to succeed him, long vanished from journalism in New York into railroads and measurable affluence in London. Amos J. Cummings, I think, then journalist, now shining with political splendor as a kind of Tammany magnate and Congressman, completed the committee. About Cummings I am not sure.

We resolved that it should be a dinner worthy of Dickens, and representative of whatever was clever and good in our calling. Upon that there was instant agreement, and we went about it in a severe, unrelenting way. I shall, I presume, never know, until I have access in the eternities to the books of Time, the enemies I made as Chairman of that Committee in repressing young ambition and suppressing rising talent that would shine and astonish Dickens. No Robespierre — Carnot, Revolutionary Committee of Safety was more implacable in the resolution to suppress the self-glorification that the occasion would awaken. Who should preside? Who but William Cullen Bryant? Of the host of those who had known and welcomed Dickens when he came in 1842, Bryant alone remained. When Bryant was sought with the purpose of extending the invitation, he was in a state of offended dignity. Dickens either had not called upon him, or, as is more probable, Bryant had called on Dickens and the courtesy had not been returned. I fancy there must have been a mistake, as Dickens seemed exemplary in such social pieties. At all events, he had taken no pains to see Bryant. The poet, therefore, would not preside, nor would he even attend the dinner.

Bryant out of the way, there was no special sorrow in my mind in that regard, as I was anxious for Greeley. The professional renown of Greeley justified the honor, and more than that, he was friendly to Dickens and much esteemed by him. There was a battle over this — some of my colleagues afraid of the consequences. Greeley was not popular. His hand had fallen heavily upon many, whose society would be grateful. Some, Thurlow Weed among the number, would not come because of Greeley. He might object to wine; people unacquainted with him did not know what he would do. Once in the chair, might declaim upon bran bread or a vegetable diet, or insult the Democratic guests. One thing was sure — Mr. Bennett would never let such a dinner pass without an arrow flight of sarcasm. And more and more of this, the end being that no chairman ever presided with more grace and dignity than Mr. Greeley, and no incident of the banquet was more striking than his persuasive eloquence and humor.

Among other things out of this famous dinner came the celebrated association of ladies which now flourishes in New York as Sorosis. Dickens was to be honored by the brethren of his craft, the working men of the press. But where were the working women? Why should not the gifted women of America be permitted to do honor to the master if Fanny Fern was moving in her eloquence in that regard; the proud, sanguine, high souled Fanny, with a spirit like Tudor Elizabeth, coming to me so often in these later years. Dear Alice Cary, her genius as exquisite as when it commanded the proud admiration of Poe, with the shadows of her soon to be good night softening her gracious presence; dear Alice Cary could not endure that Dickens should leave with no recognition from those like herself who loved him. I was with the women. It seems the strangest thing possible that there should have been a question. When it came before the committee the unanswerable argument was that there was no room. The men had helped themselves — where was the place for the ladies? I was dissatisfied with the argument and voted for the ladies, but with the minority. As a result, the ladies, under the leadership of Alice Cary, Mrs. Croly, Miss Kate Field and others, resolved to form a club of their own; to exclude the men from their festivities, as they had been excluded from this dinner; and when Dickens or some other of relative fame came to the United States, they would honor him in their own sweet and gracious way. They named their club Sorosis, and even as determined upon by the justly angry ladies who were denied admission to the Dickens festival, it has flourished and flourishes even to the present day. Among other contributions to the happiness of mankind it was appointed that Dickens should indirectly give us Sorosis.

To return for a moment to the narrative of Mr. Kimball. I read that when the guests assembled there was some apprehension that Dickens would not come, that there was a panic, that “the committee felt specially compromised,” and “finally sent word to Mr. Dickens through his most intimate friend that come he must, if he had to be brought in an ambulance.” The impression that there was any hesitation on the part of Dickens in accepting the splendid tribute that had been arranged with so much care, does his memory grave injustice.

Dickens, as a matter of fact, took a deep interest in the dinner, and when I saw him, as I did on occasion in a neighborly way, was curious as to the details — wanted to see the list of guests and to be told who was who. And when he heard that from all over the Union men of the highest station were coming to do him honor, he was deeply impressed. Brilliant as I felt our dinner would be, I knew he would rise to it. I did not know, as we all do now, that he meant to make as far as was in his power his farewell a grand recantation of the severe and absurd things he had said and written about the United States.

The afternoon of the dinner, when I called to arrange some minor detail, time of coming and so on, I found Dickens in great pain, lying on the lounge, his right foot bare, Dr. Fordyce Barker bending over it. The foot had troubled him off and on, he said, but he put it down to our “dreadful weather.” “That morning while writing to Lord Lytton,” pointing to an unfinished letter on the desk, “the pain smote into helplessness.” Dr. Barker pronounced it neuralgia of the foot, and was afraid the exposure of the dinner would be too much. Dickens, in his earnest way, said that he would go if he had to be carried by “Dolby and the rest of them,” as the Pope was carried into St. Peter’s on a throne, with a grotesque description of the effect it would produce, the bearing him aloft to bless the assembled journalists. It had been proposed, and for this reason the guests were bidden at an earlier hour than usual, that Dickens should have a little reception before dinner, with the chance of taking each guest by the hand to give and receive some friendly word. This was at once vetoed. Mr. Dickens must not stand, and as soon as he came dinner would be served. Mr. Greeley would meet him at the hotel, and the guests were prepared for what was in a way a disappointment, the impossibility of the reception.

In time he came, looking ill, and as he walked into the room leaning on the arm of Mr. Greeley the company formed a lane, and with difficulty he kept his way to his seat. I had occasion to speak to him, and he said that Barker had swathed him in black silk, but he was in horrible pain. He was cheerful, merry even, and said that Mr. Greeley must protect him from violence if he should leave before the feast was over. We were all in concern about him, and those who knew the facts felt that his presence was in truth a heroic thing, what alone a brave man could do.

It was a noble gathering, ever to be remembered. Two hundred guests and from all parts of the Union — men of authority and renown. Horace Greeley, in the prime of health and genius, his almost sixty years resting lightly upon him, with a deep red rose in a wine glass whose perfume he would now and then inhale, to the scandal of many near-sighted guests who saw with their very eyes that he was sipping wine. There was Raymond, the chivalrous, gracious, eloquent, tender-hearted man, in the early days of a brilliant career, and ere many months were to pass to fall stricken in the night; Boker, in the noble beauty of his young ripening manhood, but upon whose brow genius and fortune had rested the crown of achievement and renown; Bowles, of Springfield, then famous as the embodiment of virtuous journalism, with his pale Puritan face; "Harry Franco Briggs," who had been the friend and partner of Poe, the years resting upon him, one of the few who had known and welcomed Dickens a quarter of a century before; Hawley, of Connecticut, soldier, Governor, journalist, in time to be and remain Senator; Charles Eliot Norton, from Cambridge, one greatly esteemed by Dickens; Parton, with his calm, fine face; the brilliant Hassard; young Stedman, the poet, hovering between literature and finance, not quite sure whether he would be a Rothschild or an Addison, apparently still undetermined; George William Curtis, who was to make the speech of the evening; Charles Nordhoff, lieutenant of Bryant, sturdy, constant, earnest, true; Lester Wallack, the comedian; Frank B. Carpenter, the artist, likewise held in esteem by Dickens, studying our guest with the proud fond eyes that had rescued the features of Lincoln and so many great ones from the night we call life and given them to the day we call time. Philadelphia had sent McClure, heavy with the honors of having maintained the Republican ascendancy in Pennsylvania, unconscious of the greater honors that awaited him. Thomas Nast, then as now one of the most famous as he is now one of the most brilliant and worthy of our sons; Hurlbert, a corruscating quantity on the World, and Whitelaw Reid, who was about to close a noted career in the journalism of the West, and win another and more noted in the journalism of the East.

These among the living and the dead come as the shadows from the Dickens festival. The committee had been imperious as to speaking. There was to be no buncombe, no fustian, no zoological eloquence over eagles and lions and other birds and beasts of prey. Dickens should see us at our best. But it was no easy task. Bryant had flown off irreclaimably — no Thanatopsis eyes to speed Dickens over the seas. Weed would not come but sent a quaint, elaborate letter, which with the other letters, because of our guest's sufferings and the need of speeding things, was not read. Then at the last moment there was the fearful rumor that Raymond would be absent. It was impeachment times, the political air feverous, and Greeley and Raymond had taken to calling each other liars in the fond old endearing way, and what if the discussion would break out under these sulphurous conditions before the very eyes of our guest. What a sight for the master who had created Pogram and Jefferson Brick. But with Raymond and Greeley, these tempters were the very foam at the beaker of wine, and underneath was the ever present chivalry, forbearance and kindly regard. A battle also as to whether Hurlbert should speak; certain grumblings from Boston in opposition. But upon this Croly came down in his firm Celtic way, and by all the gods that were ever overthrown by Saint Patrick, Hurlbert should speak or there would be no dinner. That settled it. Halstead was selected from the West, then not quite a field marshal, but welcomed by us all for his noble and princely qualities. There was Demers, of Albany, now no longer visible in my range of journalism; T. B. Thorpe, the lively, genial "Bee Hunter," who had been a colonel in the Mexican war, great on sporting themes, kind of painter, too, as well as soldier and journalist, to remain with us until 1878, and leave many gracious memories behind him.

The speaking was about the best I ever heard. Greeley was crisp, quaint, original, told how he tried in a Florentine inn to read Copperfield in Italian, and gave a noble toast which made every glass ring — "Health and happiness, honor and generous, because just recompense to our friend and guest, Charles Dickens."

Dickens spoke with an ease marvelous to those who knew his suffering. I should rank him high among orators, — certainly among dinner speakers. The presence, the grace, the perfect self-possession; the grave, kindly, rather husky tones of the voice, and the striking personality of the man were dominating. His speech was prepared, — you have all read it in his books, — for he decreed that it should be a part of them while his wishes had any power. He spoke from memory amid the closest attention, and at times enraptured enthusiasm. There was a figure at the end, — it were better for the two nations to go back to the ice age and be given over to the Arctic fox and bear, than fight, that brought us to our feet, — and as he sat down in a storm of cheers the band played "God Save the Queen."

Raymond spoke as he always did, with clear, courtly eloquence. We cheered him a great deal because the newspaper people liked Raymond and rather resented Greeley's having called him a liar in a recent Tribune. Hurlbert was classical; Hawley eloquent over his memories of the first Dickens visit. Boker was dragged out in some way as an afterthought by Mr. Greeley, and made a short, impressive address. Norton spoke for Boston, Halstead for the West; De Leon, who had been in the Confederacy, represented the South, while the gentle and accomplished Youmans answered for the journalism of science. There were some words from Demers and the Bee Hunter. The one speech was that of George William Curtis. I never heard that distinguished orator to greater advantage, and I remember the enthusiasm of Dickens over the address as we went home in the carriage. The peroration, spoken as only Curtis could speak it, in the low, musical cadence of his marvelous voice, leaning toward Dickens as in the attitude of farewell, aroused tremendous cheers. "Old ocean bear him safely over. English hedges welcome him with the blossoms of May! English hearts, he is ours as he is yours. We stand upon the shore. We say farewell — and as he sails away we pray with love and gratitude — may God bless him." The farewell of Curtis to Dickens can never pass from the memory of those who heard it, and saw what was possible in the supreme beauty of eloquence.

The rapture of applause, the glow and go of fellowship, the laughter and the wine, the sense that we were having' a Dickens night; so many ruling, true original spirits from our various sections, almost every face a notability, served to enfold our dinner as with a rare atmosphere. It irradiated Dickens, as he sat there, the guest, the man, the master; one after another of us sidling up under the blazing lamps to do him homage. The unique splendor of the scene rested heavily upon me, knowing the condition of Dickens, and having been of the anxious conference that determined his coming, I went to his chair once or twice with suggestions of home. Greeley was sure that departure was humane and wise when the speech of Dickens was done. Raymond, sitting at the side of Dickens, pressed for departure, and said that the company with proper knowledge would demand it. But how could he tear away from so splendid a feast? "I fear," he said, "I am like the mummy that the Egyptians passed around at their dinners. If the mummy, however, were not on duty as an entree, it would have been an imperfect feast."

When Norton had spoken, Dickens, who was my vis-avis, beckoned to me. "The pain," he said, "is simply horrible. I think I will take the advice of Mr. Greeley if you are quite sure it will not be misunderstood." Before calling on Halstead, Mr. Greeley arose and said that he knew the expression of sympathy that would come from every one in that company when they were told of the suffering of the guest; when they remembered that in spite of pain he had spent so much of the evening with them, and that they would excuse him now, with every loving wish for his speedy recovery and favoring breezes home. The company arose as if by instinct, and stood while Dickens shook hands with Greeley, Raymond, Curtis and those around, and as well as the pain would permit him slowly moved out of the room. A cheer of farewell started by some hearty admirer awakened a whirl of cheers, continuous and resonant, until Dickens was outside the Delmonico walls. He was grateful over the company and for what had been said; dwelt upon the intellectuality of Greeley, Raymond and others, and the inexpressible charm of the eloquence of Mr. Curtis. "No orator in England," he said, "who could have surpassed Curtis in grace and feeling." When we came to the hotel Dickens insisted that I should return to the banquet, as his immediate concern was with his bed and Dr. Barker. Standing in the doorway he would not say farewell, for he knew I would come to England. And when I came let it be "when the hedges are in bloom," and I was to "report at Gadshill."

I came, and the hedges were in bloom, but there was no master at Gadshill. Dickens was asleep in the silence of the Abbey beside Johnson, Macaulay and Sheridan. I was never to see Dickens again. To the Dickens whom I knew, and the impressions of him as here crudely shadowed, I was to add, during my extended residence in London, even another Dickens — the man as he had been to so many who had known his life. From all came the one tribute — the recognition of his fine truth and nobility as a man walking among men. I can give this sentiment no more eloquent expression than what came from Carlyle, when the news of the sudden death of Dickens came upon him, as it came upon mankind, with the sense somewhat that one more glorious star had set, and that the heavens would never shine with the same splendor. "It is almost thirty years," wrote Carlyle, "since my acquaintance with Dickens began, and on my side, I may say, every new meeting ripened into more and more clear discernment of his rare and great worth as a brother man — a most cordial, sincere, clear-sighted, quietly decisive, just and loving man — till at length he had grown to such a recognition with me as I have rarely had from any man of my time. The good, the gentle, high-gifted, ever-friendly, noble Dickens, every inch of him an Honest Man."

At the time of the above written article Mr. Young received this letter from Judge F. G. Gedney, of New York: —

My dear Mr. Young: — Apropos of your article on Dickens, if you could look over the old assignment book of the Tribune, you would find: Gedney:

— "Go down the bay with Dickens." I did. We were on a little tugboat. The late James T. Field, of Boston; Thurlow Weed, George W. Childs, William Winter, and I cannot now remember all. We went alongside the steamer, and I saw both Mr. Dickens and Mr. Dolby talking with an officer and separated from the party. I had just time to say to Dickens, "Can I bear any answer for you to the Tribune?" Shaking my hand in a hearty manner, Mr. Dickens said, "Tell Mr. Young that I shall never forget his kindness." So, perhaps, the last words spoken to an American in America by Mr. Dickens were the words I have written.

Yours truly, F. G. Gedney.

Gadshill Place, Higham By Rochester, Kent, Monday, Fifteenth June, 1868. My dear Mr. Young: — Many thanks for your kind letter of the fourteenth of last month, and for the copies of the New York Tribune. I am happy to report that three or four days at sea vanquished both the catarrh and the neuralgia, and that I came home in great force. I am now looking out expectantly for Longfellow.

With kindest regards to Mr. Greeley when you see him, believe me, Always faithfully yours,
Charles Dickens.

On the death of Dickens, Mr. Young wrote this editorial In the New York Standard, June 11th, 1870: —

"Mr. Dickens concluded the last book which he gave to the world with this paragraph:

"On Friday, the ninth of June, in the present year, Mr. and Mrs. Boffin (in the manuscript dress of receiving Mr. and Mrs. Lamble at breakfast) were in the South Eastern Railway with me in a terribly destructive accident. When I had done what I could to help others, I climbed back into my carriage, nearly turned over a viaduct and caught aslant upon the turn, to extricate the worthy couple. They were much soiled, but otherwise unhurt. The same happy result attended Miss Bella Wilfer on her wedding-day, and Mr. Riderhood inspecting Bradley Headstone's red neckerchief as he lay asleep. I remember, with devout thankfulness, that I can never be much nearer parting company with my readers forever than I was then, until there shall be written against my life the two words with which I have closed this book — (the end).”

As though these words were a presentiment of his-own fate, the time came to write “The End” to his illustrious and noble career on the 9th of June, 1870, On that day, just five years after this strange event and its singular anticipation, Mr. Dickens died at his country residence, near London, in the fifty-ninth year of his age.

With the exception of Lord Byron and Sir Walter Scott, no modern English writer has filled so vast a place as Mr. Dickens, and none since Burns will be so widely mourned. We question if Byron or Scott enjoyed a renown so rare and universal. There will be many who would regard the loss of Thackeray and Wordsworth and Shelley and Tennyson as a greater misfortune; but, without denying the claims of these men to higher grade of art, it is certain that Mr. Dickens came into a closer relation with the nineteenth century than any writer who lived in it. His art was his humor and his sympathy. He amused as well as instructed. The children of his fancy have long been more than creations of fancy to nine-tenths of the general readers of the English language.

Our current literature has drawn upon him for illustration more largely than any writer since Shakespeare and Bunyan. Like Shakespeare and Bunyan, his genius was universal. The dramatist and politician — the man of the drawing-room and the exchange, and society have come to know his characters as friends and associates — to give them speech and action, and make them a part of everyday existence.

This is one of the highest attributes of genius. We know Hamlet and Othello and Iago and Macbeth, and the fair Ophelia, as though they were our friends. The journey of Christian and the terrors of Doubting Castle, and the visions of the Enchanted Land, belong to our earliest and brightest dreams, and in the same life and the same dreams we have Micawber and Weller, and Little Nell, and Nancy Sikes, the Fleet Prison, the Circumlocution Office, the Mansion of the Dedlocks, and the wild sea wares which never speak to us without something of the strange meaning they gave to Little Paul.

This is what we have called the universal power of genius. Upon such a dominion he entered at the outset of his career and reigned to the end. How much we owe this man, even the best of us! For in whatever place we walk, no matter how high in philosophy or sublime in poetry, we have all of us come within his hearty and imposing influence, and known freshness and rest and incentive to loftier aims. The world is better because he lived in it. He has taught us patience, faith, the sweetness of domestic love, the peace of the fireside. Some one has said of him that he made the Christmas trees to blossom, and over all England and English lands the Christmas fires to burn merrily.

His gospel has been simple, but truthful, — to eat, drink and be happy, to live peacefully, marry early, and be content with our daily bread. He never went beyond society. He believed in lords and gentlemen, the sacraments, the gallows, power, the British Constitution, the old traditions, and was a thorough Conservative. His world was the world we live in, and although he took us into the byways, and far down into the haunts of sin and misery, and threw broad, purifying, strengthening light and freshness into many dark and noisome depths, he never ascended. He had not the courage and sweep of Hugo, and gave us nothing like “Les Miserables.” He was no worshipper of abstract ideas. The man who sinned should be punished; the women who fell should die; for the naked there should be clothing, for the hungry food, for the poor great content and an assured plum-pudding on Christmas day.

Beyond this he saw nothing but society and the statutes. He never ventured upon dangerous ground; nor did it ever seem to him that our whole modern society, church, law, system, Parliament, the monarchy, under what we call religion and justice, there was a great wrong to be redressed, and mighty crimes, no less criminal because the world approved them. In nothing is this more painfully seen than in his view of the French Revolution. We pass through marvelous scenes with a shiver, seeing nothing but the guillotine and the Jacquerie; the dripping heads; the wine that seemed to be blood; the men, black and swarthy and hideous; the fearful women knitting under the axe; the king with a big face; and France itself a land of terror and crime and death.

This was all that our great writer saw in those glorious and memorable years, and those who look for an apostle in every teacher, may feel that a work which was limited and superficial was only partly done. We make no such criticism. Mr. Dickens did a good and glorious work — such as no man could do in his stead.

Mr. Dickens had various gifts. He was a journalist, an actor, a dramatist, a poet, a biographer and a historian. He had amazing industry. He died in the prime of life, and yet see how much he did! His written works would make a good library — his edited works, even daily and weekly publications for many years — in themselves the labor of a man's life. As an actor and reader, he must have given as much time as the most industrious comedian on the London stage. This intense, absorbing labor, no doubt, cost him his life. Those who met him in America saw, beneath his rugged, manly face, the marks of hard, anxious toil. The bright and blithesome, curly-headed youth who came here in 1841 was prematurely old and gray and worn. He lived a generous and easy life. This is the saddest thought about the death of Dickens. He was in the afternoon of an illustrious and glorious career. The time of rest had come — the time which came to Goethe, and Wordsworth, and Landor — a time for thought and contemplation, and some one work, perhaps, to crown and cap his edifice. But he had lived with too much intensity and he died too soon.

It is not the time — standing, as we do, over his grave and sharing in the deep sorrow which to-day fills the heart of the English-speaking world — the sorrow of millions who feel the loss of Mr. Dickens as that of a personal friend — to estimate his position in our permanent literature.

Writers of fancy and sentiment are apt to live with their generation and die with the fashions and customs in which they lived. There was no more popular novelist than Richardson, and yet his books are as dead as the men and women he described.

DeFoe has left one book which is a classic, and we may say as much of Goldsmith. Fielding gave us "Tom Jones" and Smollet "Humphrey Clinker." Beyond this, their "works" are almost forgotten. The early novelists of the nineteenth century have passed into silence. Scott remains, but with a limited and dying influence. We fear we must say as much for Disraeli and Bulwer.

Thackeray seems to gain with every year (there is no such book as "Vanity Fair!") and although Dickens has passed through two generations, his works were never more popular than to-day.

Much of what he has done will, no doubt, share the silence and neglect that have come upon most of the books of Fielding and Scott, but we are greatly at fault in our estimate of his labor, if the time will ever come when the English world will cease to regard with classic veneration the "Pickwick Papers" and "Nicholas Nickleby."

DICKENS IN AMERICA

From: The Outlook V.98 May 20, 1911 p.109-113

By Thomas Wentworth Higginson

This article, written in view of the approaching centenary of Charles Dickens's birth, was one of the last pieces of literary work from the pen of Colonel Higginson, who died at his home in Cambridge on May 9. Elsewhere in this number of The Outlook will be found some estimate of Colonel Higginson's place in American life and literature. — The Editors.

One of the most vivid remembrances of my Harvard College life, now some seventy years away, was that time when my elder brother came home one afternoon from his modest office in Boston and burst upon us in our Cambridge parlor with the words: "There is a new book from England, about which every one in Boston is talking, and it has such an odd name — 'The Pickwick Papers, by Boz.'" Upon this there was a cry of wonder at a name so strange. Then my aunt, Mrs. Francis Channing — grandmother of the present Sir Francis Channing, in the British House of Commons — a lady who had just arrived from England, cried out: "Is it possible! Has the name of 'Boz' reached America?" In fact, the word "Boz" had come earlier than that of "Pickwick;" and there was another personage, Sam Weller, whose name had already inspired more enthusiasm than either. Then we began to wonder whether this great wizard, Boz, would ever be wafted across the Atlantic, and make his characters move and breathe on American soil.

It was some time, however, before the fulfillment of this vision. The event was on a bleak winter night in the year 1842, when the young English author was piloted by James T. Fields to what was then the Tremont House, now supplanted by the Tremont Building. This was the great resort for newly arrived English travelers. I had relatives in what was then a private house opposite, and from their windows we often looked with interest on foreign passengers hastily unloaded in rainy weather at the door of the hotel. James Fields, who was then but five-and-twenty or so, was always ready to receive guests, and has left this description of the visitor at that time: "Young, handsome, almost worshiped for his genius, belted round by such troops of friends as rarely ever man had." We can easily imagine "young Boz," as they still called him, joining Lord Mulgrave, his fellow-traveler on the voyage, and eagerly sallying forth, even on a winter evening, to take his first look at an American city. Boz, at least, muffled himself in a shaggy fur coat and went forth on the frozen snow, wisely keeping in the middle of the street. "We boys," says Fields, "followed cautiously behind, but near enough not to lose any of the fun." Of course the English visitors soon lost their way on emerging into Washington Street from Tremont. Dickens kept up a stream of uproarious laughter as he went swiftly forward, reading the signs on the shops, to him unutterably quaint and odd. When the two youths came out opposite the Old South Church, Dickens screamed with laughter, but Fields never, he says, succeeded in understanding just why.

My first real glimpse of Dickens, when a boy of nineteen, was at a party in Boston. I find this entry in my journal: "Rather tired for a ball, but then the idea of seeing Boz I" I went with one of the prominent Jackson family of Boston, and we were wedged in a great crowd, when we were suddenly told that Dickens was close by with Charles Sumner. Miss Jackson was pulled forward and introduced to Boz, who, after speaking to Sumner, leaned over to my companion and said, benignantly, "Not a very good corner for confidential conversation I" Then he and Sumner pushed off through the crowd.

"Miss J. became a lion at once," continues the record, and "Sarah Hale (Dr. Hale's beautiful sister) was excited because she had been introduced to Dickens and had talked to him some time." Boz was the principal subject of conversation all that winter, sometimes to my youthful chagrin,- as when I thus record walking home from a dance with a young damsel: "She insisted on talking 'Barnaby Rudge' all the way, instead of ourselves!"

To refer again to my diary, I find this entry: "February 5. Home, and found them in great excitement at having seen Boz and actually shaken hands with him in the College Library, after he had breakfasted with Mr.

Longfellow. What a glorious thing it is for a whole nation to rise up and do homage to the genius of one young man!"

The following lively account of the persecutions to which Dickens was subjected by his admirers on his first visit has never before been published, and is taken from a letter written to me by my old friend Charles Parsons, a nephew of Dr. Holmes, and dated February 3, 1842. Speaking of a walk in Cambridge, he says the soil clung "to me like the women to Boz. . . . What devilish fools — I must speak my opinion — folks are making of themselves about Boz. . . . The poor man has from 150 to 200 applications for autographs per diem, has to keep a private • secretary to do all but the signatures; shouldn't wonder if that — on an emergency. . . . Alexander [a well-known Boston artist of that day] got the privilege of taking Dickens's portrait. The ladies pressed in so to stare at him that he at last couldn't bear it, swore a big oath that he wouldn't sit there to be gazed at, and bolted for the door. He was soon obliged to bolt it, for his fair, bewitched, and bewitching tormentors rushed after the persecuted wretch to see him come out. Whether Alexander had any crackers and cheese I know not, but at any rate, he was not prepared to stand a blockade, and Boz had in time to leave his fortress and attempt to paddle. The fairy sprites were instantly at him, one seized his hand to claim the privilege, etc. 'You do me too much honor,' exclaimed the distracted author, and made a straight coat-tail for the Tremont House. . . . Really, it is too bad that he should get such an idea of the ill-breeding of our people."

Dickens made bitter complaints himself of these unfortunate attentions, but he was less annoyed on his later trip — perhaps because more carefully guarded.

I find in my diary for 1842 the following extract from a speech of Dickens's at a dinner given by the young men of Boston:

"I cannot help expressing the delight, the more than happiness, it was to me to find so strong an interest awakened, on this side of the water, in favor of that little heroine of mine, to whom your president has made allusion, who died in her youth. I had letters about that child, in England, from the dwellers in log houses among the morasses, and swamps, and densest forests, and deepest solitudes of the Far West. Many a sturdy hand, hard with the ax and spade, and browned by the summer's sun, has taken up the pen and written to me a little history of domestic joy or sorrow, always coupled, I am proud to say, with interest in that little tale, or some comfort or happiness derived from it; and the writer has always addressed me, not as a writer of books for sale, resident some four or five thousand miles away, but a friend to whom he might freely impart the joys and sorrows of his own fireside. Many a mother — I could reckon them now by dozens, not by units — has done the like ; and has told me how she has lost such a child at such a time, and where she lay buried, and how good she was, and how, in this or that respect, she resembled Nell. I do assure you that no circumstance of my life has given me one hundredth part of the gratification I have derived from this source. I was wavering at the time whether or not to wind up my clock, and come and see this country, and this decided me. . . . And even now I have such an odd sensation in connection with these things, that you have no chance of spoiling me. . . . At every new act of kindness on your part, I say it to myself — that's for Oliver — I should not wonder if that were meant for Smike — I have no doubt that is intended for Nell ; and so I become a much happier, certainly, but a more sober and retiring man, than ever I was before.”

The courage and independence of Dickens are shown by the attitude he took on slavery. In his “American Notes,” published after his return to England, he quotes pages of shocking paragraphs and bloodthirsty slave advertisements taken, during his first visit here, from Southern newspapers, and then exclaims: “What! shall we declaim against the ignorant peasantry of Ireland and mince the matter when these Americans taskmasters are in question? Shall we cry shame on the brutality of those who hamstring cattle and spare the lights of freedom to those who notch the ears of men and women!

“Shall we whimper over legends of the tortures practiced on each other by the pagan Indians, and smile upon the cruelties of Christian men! Shall we, so long as these things last, exult above the scattered remnants of that race, and triumph in the white enjoyment of their broad possessions? Rather, for me, restore the forest and the Indian village; in lieu of stars and stripes, let some poor feather flutter in the breeze; replace the streets and squares by wigwams; and, though the death-song of a hundred haughty warriors fill the air, it will be music to the shriek of one unhappy slave.”

Indeed. Dickens's desire to be useful was unlimited, and Daniel Webster, while in England, declared that the novelist had done more to help the condition of the English poor than all the statesmen in Parliament.

The enthusiasm which met the announcement of another visit to America in November, 1867, was hardly less exuberant, our people having forgotten, in their joy at greeting the great writer, their soreness over his sharp criticisms of American peculiarities. But it is always to be remembered that Dickens said nothing about Americans more unpleasant than he had previously said about his own countrymen.

At the time of his second visit I heard Dickens read, and find my impression recorded in this letter dated at Newport, Rhode Island, December 29, 1867:

“My Dear Sisters — I have been away again lecturing, Thursday night at Salem, and Friday at Lexington, and now am settled for the winter, my lecturing pretty much ended. This is why I did not write to you sooner about Dickens, whom I heard with Una [Hawthorne] on Christmas Eve.

“I enjoyed it as much as I originally expected. Our seats were admirable — the Fields bench — and Sam Longfellow sat by me. I think this explains half the dissent about his readings — people far off must miss so much. It was a sort of comic Fanny Kemble, the transformation of face and voice equaling hers — falling short of her in all high pathos, but having the advantage of narrative or recitative parts, which she has not, and which he made as good as anything. The ‘Christmas Carol’ and ‘Pickwick Trial’ were read, and the narratives of the Cratchet dinner and the Fezziwigs’ ball were as good as any of the dialogue. The ghostly part of the ‘Carol,’ which I always thought poor, became effective and Hamlet-like in his hands. In this Scrooge and Bob Cratchet were perfectly individualized; in the Trial the lawyers all, and Mr. Winkle. Sam Weller seemed nothing to me, though Fields said better than ever before! Some of the best characters (as with Mrs. Kemble) are those which only appear once or twice, with their individuality fixed forever — as the foolish juryman in the Trial who asks for the date — such a face of eager fussy triviality; and again the two merchants who talk on ‘Change about Scrooge’s death. This seemed to me the crowning triumph. I should have supposed that only Shakespeare and Fanny Kemble could endow with equal life the slightest and most elaborate portraiture.

“His face, though thin, is clear, and his magnetism irresistible for comedy — a single epithet set all in convulsions. But whenever he tried pathos beyond a certain point — only once, though, in Tiny Tim’s death — he failed; as do all, I think, except Fanny Kemble, and, notably, Booth.

“Dickens is much smaller than I expected, slim and quick and birdlike — like my impression of Tom Moore; he looks insignificant, but that his head is fine and well placed. There is nothing flashy or vulgar about him, which I feared. The Fields both praise him highly in private. Fields says he is not coarse and vulgar in talk, like Thackeray, and told stories of his great kindness, and says he is amusing beyond compare, as he imitates everybody. Dickens has a report merely that Browning and Jean Ingelow are to marry, but Fields disbelieves it. I have not met Dickens.”

It must be remembered that this visit happened nearly fifty years ago, when comparatively few Americans had crossed the Atlantic or come into contact with English life and customs. It was said that the readings were more successful in New York than in Boston, because the applause of New York audiences was instantaneous. Possibly Boston audiences were less responsive then than now, although, when we remember how Boston people stood in line all through the coldest winter nights to obtain tickets to these readings, we can be sure that there was no real lack of enthusiasm.

Fields was doubtless right in applying to Dickens what was said of Garrick, that he was the cheerfulest man of his age, and his jollity was contagious. As Carlyle said, “he was a whole theater.” It is told of a little dinner given by Dickens in Boston, that his dramatic and comic representations so convulsed his guests with laughter that in sheer exhaustion they broke up the gathering to “save their lives.”

One of the best tributes to Dickens’s fame is the way in which he has been quoted by other authors, who have lavishly used his characters and incidents to illustrate their own text. He came upon the scene when the exaggerated, emotional tendency flourished in literature. All this seemed blown away in an instant by the first appearance of Sam Weller upon the scene. Dickens himself bore marked traces of the very epidemic he banished, and his Little Pauls were the last survival of the sentimental period. Nevertheless, it was he more than any one else who exorcised it; and whatever its merits, he rendered the world a service in that act of grace.

He produced a long and rapid series of fiction, each individual book standing by itself and each quite outside the world of fashion and society, material with which few before Dickens had dealt. It was all most un-English; for instance, his only conspicuous nobleman was called by the contemptuous name of Lord Verisopht; yet he made in all a series of books absolutely new, whether in style or social atmosphere, and he rarely called on great historical events for material. He so refrained from using the prevailing English class of subjects that I myself remember hearing Lord Houghton criticising him for it at a dinner in London many years later. Countless novels are full of the enjoyment of wealth; but how many celebrate the joys of poverty? The pride of its little prudences, the joy of its wholesome abstinences, the magnificent delight of its occasional holidays — who but Dickens ever described them? Who but his little Jacob ever knew what oysters were, or really saw a play? His earnestness of work is illustrated by his preparation for the “Tale of Two Cities,” when he persuaded Carlyle to send him all his reference books on the French Revolution, and he read them until he knew them by heart.

The time came when I was to be personally bound to Dickens, through a tie quite unknown perhaps to him, on his second busy visit to this country. This was through a neatly printed little book bearing his name alone, yet which I was employed by Ticknor & Fields, his exclusive publishers in this country, to prepare. This was called “Child Pictures from Dickens,” and was based on extracts from his books. I have the only copy ever seen by me. Its successive chapters bore the titles of “Little Nell,” “The Marchioness,” “Paul and Florence,” “The Fat Boy,” “Tiny Tim,” “Smike,” and “Oliver Twist,” and it was well illustrated by the younger Eytinge, then prominent as an illustrator, under the superintendence of A. V. S. Anthony. It contained a brief preface from Dickens himself, which was dated November, 1867, the month in which he reached America, although the book had been chiefly prepared before he sailed from Europe. I find in my note-book this reference to it: “Have worked on ‘Child Pictures’ at night also.” This haste was doubtless necessary in order to have the book ready for Christmas sale at the time of Dickens’s visit.

In writing to my sisters I find recorded:

“I have been very busy, especially with the ‘Child Pictures from Dickens,’ which are now ready. ... In doing this [work] I have been very much struck with the superiority of Tiny Tim over his other pathetic pictures of children. It is the only one in which there is no trace of effort or sentimentality.” And later I have written: “He liked my selections for ‘Child Pictures’ well enough, I believe, but made the suggestion that some descriptions of eminent children should be added from his ‘Child’s History of England,’ which Fields and I thought unwise.”

It is sometimes said that young people no longer read Dickens. If this be true, I can only say, "So much the worse for the young people." To us of an older generation, how many of his characters were real beings; and what an excitement it was when we first went to England and met their counterparts on the London streets! I still remember with what glee a newly arrived member of my family wrote from Chester: "Every evening Tilly Slowboy comes out and stands under our window with her small charge; and yesterday I saw Quilp!"

In a note lately written to me by Mrs. Fields, referring to the all-absorbing interest and excitement of Dickens's second visit to America, she reminds me that during those overcrowded months the ordinary habits and occupations of his friends were brushed aside, "until the human hurricane had swept past." And she well adds, "The sense of genius could not be more forcibly felt than in the hurrying flight of this great spirit."

PREFACE.

To connect this little book with the art of Photography, by even the slight link of a title, may be considered presumptuous; but when it is remembered that the best photographs fail to do justice to their originals, and that the most interesting subjects generally receive the worst treatment, I hope to be exonerated from so grave a charge. The following pages were inspired solely by one sentiment, — that of gratitude. Their publication is induced by the hope of clinching the recollection of Mr. Dickens’s Readings in the minds of many; and, more particularly, of giving to those who have not had the good fortune to hear them, some faint outline of a rare pleasure, the like of which will ne’er come to us again. If I fail to realize this hope — I fail.

PEN PHOTOGRAPHS OF Charles Dickens’s Readings

I.

THE DESK AND THE READER.

One glance at the platform is sufficient to convince the audience that Mr. Dickens thoroughly appreciates “stage effect.” A large screen of maroon cloth occupies the background; before it stands a light table of peculiar design, on the inner left-hand corner of which there peers forth a miniature desk, large enough to accommodate the reader's book. On the right hand of the table, and somewhat below its level, is a shelf, where repose a carafe of water and a tumbler. 'Tis "a combination and a form indeed," covered with velvet somewhat lighter in color than the screen. No drapery conceals the table, whereby it is plain that Mr. Dickens believes in expression of figure as well as of face, and does not throw away everything but his head and arms, according to the ordinary habit of ordinary speakers. About twelve feet above the platform, and somewhat in advance of the table, is a horizontal row of gas-jets with a tin reflector; and midway in both perpendicular gas-pipes there is one powerful jet with glass chimney. By this admirable arrangement, Mr. Dickens stands against a dark background in a frame of gas-light which throws out his face and figure to the best advantage. With the book "Dickens" stranded on the little desk, the comedian, Dickens, can transform a table into a stage, and had the great novelist concluded at the last moment not to appear before us, this ingenious apparatus would have taught us a lesson in the art of reading.

He comes! A lithe, energetic man, of medium stature, crosses the platform at the brisk gait of five miles an hour, and takes his position behind the table. This is Charles Dickens, whose name has been a household word in England and America for thirty years; whose books have been the joy and solace of many a weary heart and head. A first glance disappointed me. I thought I should prefer to have him entirely unlike himself; but when I began to speculate on how Charles Dickens ought to look, I gave the matter up, and wisely concluded that nature knew her own intentions better than any one else. Mr. Dickens has a broad, full brow, a fine head, — which, for a man of such power and energy, is singularly small at the base of the brain, — and a cleanly cut profile.

There is a slight resemblance between Mr. Dickens and Louis Napoleon in the latter respect, owing mainly to the nose; but it is unnecessary to add that the faces of the two men are totally different. Mr. Dickens's eyes are light-blue, and his mouth and jaw, without having any claim to beauty, possess a strength that is not concealed by the veil of iron-gray mustache and generous' imperial. His head is but slightly graced with iron-gray hair, and his complexion is florid.

If any one thinks to obtain an accurate idea of Mr. Dickens from the photographs that flood the country, he is mistaken. He will see Mr. Dickens's clothes, Mr. Dickens's features, as they appear when "Nicholas Nickleby” is in the act of knocking down “Mr. Wackford Squeers;” but he will not see what makes Mr. Dickens’s face attractive; the geniality and expression that his heart and brain put into it. In his photographs Mr. Dickens looks as if, previous to posing, he had been put under an exhausted receiver and had had his soul pumped out of him. This process is no beautifier. Therefore if any one has not been able to judge for himself, let him believe that Mr. Dickens’s face is capable of wonderfully varied expression. Hence it is the best sort of face. There is a twinkle in the eye, that, like a promissory note, pledges itself to any amount of fun — within sixty minutes. After seeing this twinkle I was satisfied with Mr. Dickens’s appearance, and became resigned to the fact of his not resembling the Apollo Belvedere. One thing is certain, — that if he did resemble this classical young gentleman, he never could have written one of his novels. Laying this flattering unction to my soul I listen.

II.

“Ladies And Gentlemen, — I have the honor to read to you A Christmas Carol in four staves. Stave one, Marley’s Ghost. Marley was dead. There is no doubt whatever about that. The register of his burial was signed by the clergyman, the clerk, the undertaker, and the chief mourner. Scrooge signed it. And Scrooge’s name was good upon ‘Change, for anything he chose to put his hand to. Old Marley was as dead as a door-nail.”

At the close of this paragraph the critic beside me, whispers: “Mr. Dickens’s voice is limited in power, husky, and naturally monotonous. If he succeeds in overcoming these defects, it will be by dramatic genius.” I begin to take a gloomy view of the situation, and wonder why Mr. Dickens constantly employs the rising inflexion, and never comes to a full stop; but we are so pleasantly and naturally, introduced to “Scrooge,” that my spirits revive. “Foul weather didn’t know where to have him. The heaviest rain and snow and hail and sleet could boast of the advantage over him in only one respect, — they often’ came down’ handsomely, and Scrooge never did.” Here the magnetic current between reader and listener sets in, and when “Scrooge’s “ clerk “put on his white comforter and tried to warm himself at the candle; in which effort, not being a man of strong imagination, he failed,” the connection is tolerably well established. I see old “ Scrooge,” very plainly, growling and snarling at his pleasant nephew, and when that nephew invites that uncle to eat a Christmas dinner with him, and Mr. Dickens says that “ Scrooge “ said “that he would see him — yes, I am very sorry to say he did, — he went the whole length of the expression, and said he would see him in that extremity, first,” — he makes one dive at our sense of humor and takes it captive. Mr. Dickens is “ Scrooge;” he is the two portly gentlemen on a mission of charity; he is twice “ Scrooge “ when, upon one of the portly gentlemen remarking that many poor people would rather die than go to the work-house, he replies, “If they decrease the surplus population;” and thrice “Scrooge” when, turning upon his clerk, he says, “You’ll want all day to-morrow, I suppose?” It is the incarnation of a hard-hearted, hard-fisted, hard-voiced miser.

“If quite convenient, sir.” A few words, but they denote “Bob Cratchit” in three feet of comforter exclusive of fringe, in well-darned, thread-bare clothes, with a mild, frightened voice, so thin that you can see through it!

Then there comes the change when “Scrooge” upon going home “saw in the Knock, Marley’s face!” Of course “Scrooge” saw it, because the expression of Mr. Dickens’s face makes me see it, “with a dismal light about it, like a bad lobster in a dark cellar.” There is good acting in this scene, and there is fine acting when the dying flame leaps up as though it cried, “I know him! Marley’s ghost!” With what gusto Mr. Dickens reads that description of “Marley,” and how, “looking through this waistcoat, ‘Scrooge’ could seethe two buttons on his coat behind;” and how “Scrooge” would persist in doubting his senses because “Marley” might be “an undigested bit of beef, a blot of mustard, a crumb of cheese, a fragment of an underdone potato. There’s more of gravy than of grave about you, whatever you are.” It is excellent, and at the conclusion of Stave One, my friend, the critic, and I say, “Mr. Dickens is an actor.”

Nothing can be better than the rendering of the “Fezziwig” party in Stave Two. You behold “Scrooge” gradually melting into humanity; “Scrooge” as a joyous apprentice; that model of employers, “Fezziwig;” “ Mrs. Fezziwig” “ one vast substantial smile,” and all the “Fezziwigs.” Mr. Dickens’s expression, as he relates how “ in came the house-maid with her cousin the baker, and in came the cook with her brother’s particular friend the milkman,” is delightfully comic, while his complete rendering of that dance where “ all were top couples at last, and not a bottom one to help them,” is owing to the inimitable action of his hands. They actually perform upon the table, as if it were the floor of “Fezziwig’s” room, and every finger were a leg belonging to one of the “Fezziwig” family. This feat is only surpassed by Mr. Dickens’s illustration of Sir Roger De Coverley, as interpreted by “Mr. and Mrs. Fezziwig,” when “a positive light appeared to issue from Fezziwig’s calves,” and he “cut so deftly that he appeared to wink with his legs!” It is a maze of humor. Before the close of the stave, “Scrooge’s” horror at sight of the young girl once loved by him and put aside for gold, shows that Mr. Dickens’s power is not purely comic.

Ah, but the best of all is Stave Three. I distinctly see that “Cratchit” family. There are the potatoes that “knocked loudly at the saucepan lid to be let out and peeled;” there is “Mrs. Cratchit,” fluttering and cackling like a motherly hen with a young brood of chickens; and there’s everybody. The way those two young “Cratchits” hail “Martha” and exclaim, “There’s such a goose, Martha!” can never be forgotten. By some prestidigitation, Mr. Dickens takes off his own head and puts on a “Cratchit’s.” Later, “Bob Cratchit” and “Tiny Tim” come in. Assuredly it is “Bob’s” thin voice that pipes out, “Why, where’s our Martha?” and it is “Mrs. Cratchit” who shakes her head and replies, “Not coming!” But murder will out; and then, “Bob” relates “how Tiny Tim “behaved;” as good as gold and better.” Somehow he gets thoughtful, sitting by himself so much, and thinks the strangest things you ever heard. He told me, coming home, that he hoped the people saw him in the church, because he was a cripple, and it might be pleasant to them to remember, upon Christmas day, who made lame beggars walk, and blind men see. There is a volume of pathos in these words, which are the most delicate and artistic rendering of the whole reading.

Ah, that Christmas dinner! I feel as if I were eating every morsel of it. There are “the two young Cratchits,” who “crammed spoons into their mouths, lest they should shriek for goose before their turn;” there is Tiny Tim, who “beat on the table with the handle of his knife, and feebly cried, ‘Hooray,’” in such a still, small voice. And there is that goose! I see it with my naked eye. And O, the pudding! “A smell like a washing day!

That was the cloth. A smell like- an eating-house and a pastry-cook’s next door to each other, with a laundress’s next door to that! That was the pudding!” Mr. Dicken’s sniffing and smelling of that pudding would make a starving family believe-that they had swallowed it, holly and all. It is infectious.

What Mr. Dickens does is very frequently infinitely better than anything he says, or the way he says it; yet the doing is as delicate and intangible as the odor of violets, and can be no better described. Nothing of its kind can be more touchingly beautiful than the manner in which “Bob Cratchit” — previous to proposing “a merry Christmas to us all, my dears, God bless us” — stoops down, with tears in his eyes, and places “Tiny Tim’s” withered little hand in his, “as if he loved the child, and wished to keep him by his side, and dreaded that he might be taken from him.” It is pantomime worthy of-the finest actor.

Admirable is “Mrs. Cratchit’s” ungracious drinking to “Scrooge’s” health, and “Martha’s” telling how she had seen a lord, and how he “was much about as tall as Peter!”

It is a charming cabinet picture, and so likewise is the glimpse of Christmas at “Scrooge’s” nephew’s. The plump sister is “satisfactory, O perfectly satisfactory,” and “Topper” is a magnificent fraud on the understanding; a side-splitting fraud. I see Fred get off the sofa and stamp at his own fun, and I hear the plump sister’s voice when she guesses the wonderful riddle, “It’s your uncle Scro-o-o-o-oge!” Altogether, Mr. Dickens is better than any comedy.

What a change in Stave Four! There sit the gray-haired rascal, “old Joe,” with his crooning voice; “Mrs. Dilber,” and those robbers of dead men’s shrouds; there lies the body of the plundered unknown man; there sit the “Cratchits” weeping over “Tiny Tim’s” death, a scene that would be beyond all praise were “Bob’s” cry, “My little, little child!” a shade less dramatic. Here, and only here, Mr. Dickens forgets the nature of “Bob’s” voice, and employs all the power of his own, carried away apparently by the situation. “Bob” would not thus give way to his feelings. Finally there is “Scrooge,” no longer a miser, but a human being, screaming at the “conversational” boy in Sunday clothes, to buy him the prize Turkey “that never could have stood upon his legs, that bird. Ha would have snapped ‘em off in a minute, like sticks of sealing-wax.” There is “Bob Cratchit” behind time, trying “to overtake nine o’clock” that fled fifteen minutes before; there is “Scrooge” poking “Bob” in the ribs, and vowing he will raise his salary; and there is at last happiness for all, as “Tiny Tim” exclaims, “God bless us every one!”

I do not see how “The Christmas Carol” can be read and acted better. The only improvement possible is in “The Ghosts,” who are perhaps too monotonous; a way ghosts have when they return to earth. It is generally believed that ghosts, being "damp, moist, uncomfortable bodies," lose their voices beyond redemption and are obliged to pipe through eternity on one key. I am at a loss to see the wisdom of this hypothesis. Solemnity and monotony are not synonymous terms, yet every theatrical ghost insists that they are, and Mr. Dickens is no exception to the rule. If monotony is excusable in any one, however, it is in him; for when one actor is obliged to represent twenty-three different characters, giving to every one an individual tone, he may be pardoned if his ghosts are not colloquial.

Talk of sermons and churches! There never was a more beautiful sermon than this of "The Christmas Carol." Sacred names do not necessarily mean sacred things.

III.

"DAVID COPPERFIELD."

Nothing is more unjust than severe criticism of an artist heard or seen but once. Mr. Dickens's first rendering of "David Copperfield," disappointed me sadly in the more serious portions, and had I been obliged to give an opinion then and there, I should have declared that his tragedy wanted force, and that his description of the shipwreck at Yarmouth lacked vividness and intensity. Second and third hearings proved to me that Mr. Dickens depends upon the sympathy of his audiences for inspiration, and does not do himself full justice, unless warmly supported by them. This dependence is especially apparent in "David Copperfield," which is undoubtedly the most difficult, and most exhausting of Mr. Dickens's five readings, — being the most dramatic. I write of the reader at his best.

Ordinarily, descriptions are "most tolerable and not to be endured." In novels the eye blinks at them, and rushes off in pursuit of dialogue. In hearing them read, the ear stops itself with imaginary cotton until the plot thickens and somebody says something to somebody else. But with Boz all signs fail. You cannot possibly overlook his descriptions if you would. He runs his pen through the heart of a fact so dexterously, — after the manner of naturalists, — that it lies before you in all its length, breadth, and local coloring, and you can no more ignore it than you can ignore sunshine. Attractive then as Mr. Dickens's descriptions are in reading, they become doubly so when read by him. Without being an orator, possessing (as has been previously stated) a naturally monotonous voice, he, by the keen appreciation of his own meaning and by a most original emphasis, develops every possibility of his text, and what was previously latent stands out in bold relief. It did not take me long to discover that "Dickens," however familiar, becomes a revelation when interpreted by the author.

Thus when Mr. Dickens begins his reading of "David Copperfield" with the description of the interior of Mr. Peggotty's boat-house, I realize that I have never before had a good look at the walls whereon "were colored pictures of Abraham in red going to sacrifice Isaac in blue, and of Daniel in yellow, being cast into a den of green lions." I never clearly saw "Mrs. Gummidge" until I looked, into his face, and heard her declare that she was "a lone, lorn creetur, and everythink went contrairy with her." It is the look and querulous voice of the good old grumbling soul. Soon we are in the presence of generous, genial "Mr. Peggotty," who grows quite red in the face with delight at shaking hands with "Copperfield," and "Steerforth," and chucks "little Em'ly" under his arm just as if she were there to be chucked. In his broad, hearty, tarpaulin voice, he joyfully and simply tells of "Ham's" courtship, concluding with those mighty blows upon "Ham's" imaginary shoulders that make us wonder how Mr. Dickens can poke the air so naturally as to make us believe it to be "Ham." Yet surely this is "Ham," bashful, rubbing his hands with emotion, and, with a tear in his voice, saying, "I'd lay down my life for her, Mas'r Davy, — oh, most content and cheerful. There aint a gentleman in all the land, nor yet a sailing upon all the sea, that can love his lady more than I love her, though there's many a common man as could say better what he meant." Childlike, noble-hearted "Ham!" child-like saving in' the kiss Mr. Dickens wafts after "Em'ly," wherein there is more of the salon than of the boat-house.

"Mr. Peggotty," says "Steerforth," "you are a thoroughly good fellow and deserve to be as happy as you are to-night, my hand upon it. Ham, I give you joy, my boy. My hand upon that, too!" Mr. Dickens's change of intonation and expression in addressing the father and son, is striking, but I am inclined to think too striking, for had "Steerforth" exhibited the hatred of "Ham" that darkens Mr. Dickens's face it could not have passed unnoticed. It is a hatred that admirably suits "Steerforth" when later he calls "Ham" "a chuckle-headed fellow" and vehemently rails at himself "in that devil's bark of a boat," but not before. Ah, "Steerforth," other actors may interpret you better, but I doubt whether any one can equal the solemn yet tender sorrow with which Mr. Dickens as “Copperfield” exclaims, “O God forgive you, Steerforth, to touch that passive hand in love and friendship, never, never more!” It is a sigh from a heavy, heavy heart.

First, in Chapter Second, is that second glimpse of fretful “Mrs. Gummidge,” who is as complete a character as if she were a whole play, and then Mr. Dickens again becomes old “Mr. Peggotty.” There never was more rough-shod naïveté than his when he calls himself a “babby in regard o’ Em’ly; not to look at, but to — to consider on, you know,” and thinks his beautiful love for his little niece must be “along of my havin’ played with Em’ly so much when she was a child, and havin’ made believe as we was lions, and whales, and sharks, and French, and Turks, and porpuses, and every variety of forriners.” We could listen to the simple prattle of this overflowing heart all the evening; but alas! the pleasant comedy must give way to drama. Quickly the scene changes. Here is “Ham,” with horrorstricken face, whispering that “Em’ly’s run away;” here is “Copperfield” reading in a plaintive voice “Em’ly’s” touching letter to her old lover. Dazed and stunned, the loved and loving uncle asks in a gruff voice, “Who’s the man? I want to know his name.” Poor “Ham”! “It is your friend, Steerforth,” he says to “Copperfield” with concentrated emotion, “and he’s a damned villain!” Is this caged lion thirsting for vengeance upon “Em’ly’s” seducer the genial soul of a minute ago? I see “Mr. Peggotty” pull down his great-coat from its peg in the corner and struggle to put it on as he cries out, “Bear a hand with this! I’m struck of a heap, and can’t do it;” and as his mind wanders in the agonized refrain, “I’m going fur to seek my niece. I’m going fur to seek my Em’ly. No one stop me! I’m going to seek her fur and wide!” — who could have believed that in fretful “Mrs. Gummidge” “Mr. Peggotty” had cherished unawares an angel of peace that would bring comfort to his bruised soul in its hour of trial? Yet it is even so, and here she stands, her trembling hands affectionately stroking “Dan’l,” her querulous voice softened, reproaching herself for ever having been a “worrit,” and gradually soothing the old man to tears.’

How Mr. Dickens can pass from grave to gay without a moment’s pause is a problem difficult to solve. He does, however; and while eyes are still dimmed by the sad scene in the boat-house, we find ourselves laughing heartily at “David Copperfield” in his “top set of chambers in Buckingham Street Strand,” where he “lived principally on Dora and coffee,” and at which ecstatic era of his existence he “laid the foundation of all the corns he ever had.” “If the boots at that period,” declares “Copperfield,” in a tone that is Dickens’s own, and nobody’s else, “could only be produced and compared with the natural size of my feet, they would show in a most affecting manner what the state of my heart was.” More ridiculous still is “Mrs. Crupp,” the housekeeper, whose voice and facial expression are as good farce acting as humanity deserves. If her manner of asking for “a little tincture of cardamums, mixed with rhubarb, and flavored with seven drops of the essence of cloves; or, if he had not such a thing by him, with a little brandy,” could be impossibly caught, transfixed, and perpetuated forever, so that everybody might have it in the house and take it whenever a depressed state of the market or of individual finances required, it would harden many a softening brain and materially decrease the number of suicides. Mrs. Dickens Crupp, or Mrs. Crupp Dickens, whichever she may be, is a fascinating woman. “What makes you suppose there is any young lady in the case, Mrs. Crupp?” asks “Copperfield.”

It is worth a day’s imprisonment, with Tupper’s Proverbial Philosophy as an article of diet, to hear “Mrs. Crupp’s” reply:

“Mr. Copperfull, I’m a mother myself. Your boots and your waist is equally too small, and you don’t eat enough, sir, nor yet drink. Sir, I have laundressed other young gentlemen besides you. It was but the gentleman who died here before yourself that fell in love, — with a bar-maid, — and had his waistcoats took in directly, though much swelled by drinking. Keep a good heart, sir, and know your value. If you was to take to something, sir, — if you was to take to nine-pins now, which is a werry healthy game, — you might find it divert your mind and do you good.”

Well, “Mrs. Crupp” no sooner makes her exit than “Copperfield” greets his friends, the “Micawbers,” and “Traddles.” Traddles says but three words, “Not at all,” during the entire visit; nevertheless three words are quite enough for Mr. Dickens to make a man out of, and “Traddles” is no myth, but a confiding human being, with a propensity to eat his own fingers. “Traddles” is “not at all,” and “not at all” is “Traddles.”

In “Micawber,” Mr. Dickens undergoes quite as much of a transformation as if he enjoyed a patent-right to the necromancer’s “Presto, change.” I see him “swelling wisibly before my wery eyes,” as he tips backward and forward, first on his heels and then on his toes. Before he stops swelling, he becomes just about the size of our ideal “Micawber;” his face, quite apoplectic in hue, is fenced in by a wall of shirt-collar; he twirls his eye-glass with peculiar grace, and when he exclaims, "My dear Copperfield, this is lux-u-rious; this is a way of life which reminds me of the period when I was myself in a state of celibacy," — nearly choking himself to death before he arrives at "a state of celibacy," — the picture is complete. It is "Micawber" in "one of those momentous stages in the life of man," when he has "fallen back for a spring," and, previous to "a vigorous leap," is quite ready to fortify himself and the dearest partner of his greatness with a bachelor dinner and punch. "Micawber's" "waiting for things to "turn up; " his eloquent tribute to "the influence of Woman in the lofty character of Wife; " his magnificent trifling with the word "Discount;" and the all pervading cough, as inseparable from his speech as oxygen from air, are delectable.

Mr. Dickens could no more be "Micawber" without that cough than "Micawber" could have ever been at all without Mr. Dickens. It is the salt that gives the character savor. None but a great man misunderstood ever had such a propensity to choke. And when "Mr. Micawber" does cough, the two lapels of hair brushed above Mr. Dickens's ears, appear to be drawn by capillary attraction towards the sentiments spoken, and, waxing rampant, nod approvingly, as if to say, "just so." Neither cough nor lapels are to be found in the text, but when did finite words ever express a man's soul?

"Mr. Micawber" is so great a man that it is hardly possible for "Mrs. Micawber" to be a greater. Nevertheless, she is. Those lapels subside, and "Mrs. Micawber" sits before you, sipping her punch, smoothing her hair, "comparatively lovely," as "Copperfield" remarks, and blandly discusses "Mr. Micawber's" prospects. To describe the indescribable is absurd; yet it must not go unrecorded that "Mrs. Micawber's" sublimest moment is reached when she heroically remarks: "That, at least, is my view, my dear Mr. Copperfield and Mr. Traddles, of the obligation which I took upon myself when I repeated the irrevocable words, 'I, Emma, take thee, Wilkins.* I read the service over with a bedroom candle, on the previous night, and the conclusion I derived from it was, that I never could or would desert Mr. Micawber." As she utters these words, "Mrs. Micawber" is not to be trifled with. There is a determination in her eye that is equal to any amount of opposition; yet, if possible, her courage takes still another flight, and her mien becomes still more majestic in her final answer to -her final argument: "And here is Mr. Micawber without any suitable position or employment. Where does that responsibility rest? Clearly on society. Then I would make a fact so disgraceful known, and boldly challenge society to set it right. It appears to me, my dear Mr. Copperfield, that what Mr. Micawber has to do is to throw down the gauntlet to society, and say, in effect, ‘ Show me who will take that up. Let the party immediately step forward.’“ Why the party does not immediately step forward, the party alone can explain, for “Mrs. Micawber” has her eye on him, and looks as -if the secrets of his prison-house were no secrets at all to her, and that the perennial employment of “Mr. Micawber,” on remunerative terms, would be but slight compensation for her discreet silence.

Then the account of that dinner! Language is usually thrown away upon readers; it is snubbed unmercifully, as if every word wore the same hue instead of being possessed of a peculiar coloring, which is shaded however according to situation. Mr. Dickens is an artist, and, therefore, never takes language in vain. He embraces every opportunity; hence, when he tells us that “the pigeon pie was not bad, but it was a delusive pie, the crust being like a disappointed phrenological head, — full of lumps and bumps, with nothing particular underneath!” that adjective “delusive” prepares us for all the good things to come. It takes aim and fires at the pie, bringing down pigeons, crust, and all.

The pie no sooner disappears than merriment ceases and “Mr. Peggotty” in all his noble simplicity relates to Copperfield “how he went through France “fur to seek his niece.” “ And many a woman Mas’r Davy, as has had a daughter about Em’ly’s age, I’ve found awaiting for me, at our Saviour’s cross outside the village, fur to do me sim’lar kindnesses. Some has had daughters as was dead. And God only knows how good them mothers was to me!” Tears? yes, tears are in the old sailor’s eyes, and he is not the only one who brushes them away. “I never doubted her. No! Not a bit! On’y let her see my face, — on’y let her hear my voice, — on’y let my stanning afore her bring to her thoughts of the home she fled away from, and the child she had been, — and if she had growed to be a royal lady, she’d have fell down at my feet!” What a lesson of love and charity is taught in these few solemn words and that expressive gesture of the arm! “. All that troubles me is, to think that any harm might come to me afore this money was give back. If I was to die, and it was lost or stole, or elseways made away with, and it was never know’d by him but what I’d accepted of it, I believe the t’other world wouldn’t hold me! I believe I must come back!” Grand, old “Mr. Peggotty” (for it is he, not Mr. Dickens that speaks), well may everything be hushed in reverence as you step out into the rigorous night, for there is harbored within your breast an angel of the Lord.

The snow has suddenly ceased to fall, and all is again sunshine. “Copperfield “is steeped in” Dora,” and romantically calling on the night to shield his “Dora” “from mice, to which she had a great objection.” There are not many more delightful comedies than this short scene at “Miss Mills’s.” On the stage, “Miss Mills” would be a silly supernumerary, in a doubtful white muslin dress, with no more idea of the importance of her one little remark than a dejected canary-bird has of the importance of specie payment. But the art with which Mr. Dickens rescues the most trifling character from obscurity is positively marvellous. When “Miss Mills” is “very sorry her papa is not at home,” that young lady proves herself to be an admirable actress. The love-making between “Dora” and “Copperfield” is perfect; so is the little dog “Jip,” although he does nothing but bark. When “Copperfield” asks “Dora” if she can love a beggar, and she begins to cry an-1 “take on” and wants to go to “Julia Mills,” and “Copperfield” ravages a work-box for a smelling-bottle and applies an ivory needle-case instead, and drops all the needles over “Dora; “ and when at last the pretty doll is soothed and her lover asks, “Is your heart mine still, dear Dora?”

“O, yes! O, yes! it’s all yours. Only* don’t be dreadful! Don’t talk about beggars!”

“My dearest love, the crusts well-earned — ”

“O, yes; but I don’t want to hear any more about crusts. And after we are married, Jip must have a mutton chop every day at twelve, or he’ll die!” — Mr. Dickens is so funny that any one who loves humor as tenaciously as most people love their lives, feels deeply indebted to him.

“O, because I am such a little goose, and she knows I am!” she being “Mary Anne,” the servant who had “ a cousin in the Life Guards, with such long legs that he looked like the afternoon shadow of somebody else!” Well, into that short sentence and in its accompanying expression, Mr. Dickens condenses the whole of “Copperfield’s” “Child-wife,” — yet not the whole, for the pretty little creature has a heart full of love for her husband, and signs her own death warrant as she says with plaintive sentiment, “When you miss what you would like mo to be, and what I think-1 never can be, say ‘Still my foolish child-wife loves me.’ For indeed I do.”

But trippings of the tongue are soon forgotten in the storm raging at Yarmouth that terrible September night; in the appearance off the coast next morning of a shipwrecked schooner from Spain or Portugal; in the mad frenzy of the sea; in the daring of the solitary man who wears a singular red cap that he waves while clinging to the mast, and who was the once dear friend, — “Steerforth”; in the sublime courage of “Ham,” who “watched the sea until there was a great retiring wave, when he dashed in after it. . . . At length he neared the wreck. He was so near, that with one more of his vigorous strokes he would be clinging to it, when a high, green, vast hill-side of water moving on shoreward from beyond the ship, he seemed to leap up into it with a mighty bound, — and the ship was gone!”

With the going down of that ship, — with the solemn, significant nod of the fisherman who leads “Copperfield” to the shore where “Steerforth” lies “with his head upon his arm as he had often lain at school,” — all doubt as to Mr. Dickens’s tragic power is at an end. Thrilling as this fine description is in reading, it becomes still more so when recited by the author; yet it is no ill compliment to him to say that it is capable of still greater effect, the scene admits of wonderful scope for a mighty voice and mighty action.

Take it for all in all “David Copperfield” is an extraordinary performance. On the stage fine actors might render “Steerforth” and “Copperfield” better, and might do as much justice to “Mr. Peggotty” and “Ham.” A fine actress might throw more pathos into “Emily’s” letter; but “Mrs. Crupp,” “Mr. and Mrs. Micawber,” “Traddles,” “Dora” and “Julia Mills” are incomparable, and no one actor living can embody the twelve characters of this reading with the individuality given them by Mr. Dickens, unaided too as he is by theatrical illusion. Few realize what a triumph of art it is to overcome the chilling and depressing influence of the lecture-room.

It is strange, inasmuch as no English novelist, living or dead, has created so many dramatic pictures, that more of Mr. Dickens’s novels have not been put upon the stage. Born an actor, Mr. Dickens regards everything from a dramatic stand-point. Even in reading, you see his characters talk. So natural is his dialogue, that whole scenes may be taken from his books for private theatricals, without any adaptation whatever. They will play themselves, provided the amateurs are endowed with ordinary intelligence, and it is whispered in Gath that private theatricals are the severest test to which any literary work can be put. This power is peculiarly Dickensesque, and certainly other novelists could not publicly interpret their own works with similar effect. They may read skilfully from the poets, or they may gracefully deliver lectures, as Thackeray once did, but their novels are constructed on entirely different principles, and though they be as blood-freezing as Wilkie Collins's "Woman in White," they cannot possibly be set before an audience after the manner of Dickens. It is in the nature of Dickens to hold the mirror up to nature on the stage.

That wonderfully knowing person, Monsieur On Dit, who is perpetually "cooling his eyes" and ears at other people's keyholes, most positively declares that Mr. Dickens seriously objects to have his novels dramatized; but as Mr. Dickens is held responsible for many opinions that never entered into his most fantastic dreams, it is quite safe to conclude that he makes no such wholesale objection. For an author to protest against very bad adaptations very badly acted, is natural; but a clever dramatization cleverly delineated, is far more likely to please than displease him.

Many critics are radically opposed to the dramatization of any novel whatsoever, principally on the ground that no play can give the original work entire, and that at best it must be a sketch with much left to the imagination. As a rule, this opposition is wise, because, as a rule, novels are unfit to be trusted outside their covers. Dickens is an exception; and any one who remembers Burton's "Captain Cuttle," the late J. M. Field's "Mantilini," Mrs. Field's "Smike," Charlotte Cushman's "Nancy Sykes," E. L. Davenport's "Bob Sykes," and James W. Wallack's "Fagin," will never cease to congratulate himself upon seeing Dickens embodied. To condemn a "sketch," is to be ignorant of the fact that an artist frequently puts more inspiration into it than into more lengthy and elaborate work, for the reason that the colors can be laid on in a moment of enthusiasm. The sketch of a master is a daring concentration of his genius. Putting Dickens on the stage finely is stamping every character indelibly upon the mind. It is quite possible to forget what we read, but it is impossible to forget a fine picture that talks as well as looks. The terrible lesson of "Oliver Twist" is not fully learned until taught by the actor. If we object to Sketches from Boz in the theatre, we must, to be logical, object to Sketches from Boz by Boz in the lecture-room. What lover of Dickens is prepared to do this? And who would forego the delight of supping upon delicious tidbits because we cannot have put before us the entire joint off which these tidbits have been cut?

Of all Dickens's dramatizations, that of "Nicholas Nickleby" is, perhaps, most familiar to the public. In spite of this fact, Mr. Dickens more fully fills out the entire picture than we can ever expect to see it filled on the stage. Small parts, however important to the ensemble, are invariably delegated to incompetent actors, and theatrical "children" are the dreariest of all spectacles.

Mr. Dickens's "Squeers" is a complete embodiment. From beginning to end he is the brutal, cunning, diabolically funny beast the author's fancy paints him, and it is complimentary to Mr. Dickens's versatility of facial expression to say that with his one eye, with the blank side of his face much puckered up, and with the corners of his mouth drawn the wrong way, he looks the monster he depicts.

"This is twopenn' 'orth of milk, is it waiter?" The mug is not on that desk, but it seems to be, as "Mr. Squeers" looks into it and gives Ills order. "What a rare article milk is, to be sure, in London! Just fill that mug up with lukewarm water, William, will you?"

Then both eyes are wide open, the sinister appearance vanishes, and there stands the waiter, "William," asking If it must be filled, "To the very top, sir? Why, the milk will be drowned."

"Serve it right for being so dear;" and back comes "Squeers" in a jiffy. His stirring of that milk and water, exclaiming the while, "Here's richness," and his talking to those hungry little boys looking on with hungry eyes, about conquering their passions and not being eager after vittles, must rejoice the soul of the devil, if that distinguished individual has such an unnecessary appendage. There is an "atmosphere" about Mr. Dickens's "Squeers" which impresses us with the belief that he enjoys being a brute and is not an actor trying to be brutal. "Mrs. Squeers," too, — she who thanked God for not being a grammarian, — is quite as well individualized as her more important husband. The short dialogues between "Squeers" and herself are quite entertaining, — after their peculiar fashion, — the climax being attained when, with an eye to "Nickleby's" accommodation, "Squeers" asks, "Who sleeps in Brooks's bed, my dear?" "In Brooks's bed?" replies "Mrs. Squeers," in her most winning manner; "well, there's Jennings, — there's little Bolder, — there's Graymarsh, — and there's What's-his-name." "Mrs. Squeers" makes each syllable an independent name, so that our mind's eye contemplates ten boys in Brooks's bed.

"So there is. Yes! Brooks's is full;" and "Squeers" out-Squeers himself when turning to poor "Nickleby," he says, "I don't know, by the by, what place on whose towel to put you on; but if you'll make shift with your pocket-handkerchief to-morrow morning, Mrs. Squeers will arrange that in the course of the day." Search through every edition of Dickens, and you won't find that place in the towel, nor that pocket-handkerchief, nor in fact many of the cleverest "points" made by Mr. Dickens, which interpolations flash upon us as unexpectedly as comets, and give some good people much concern because they are not down in the book! These comets dash about most wildly in the first schoolroom scene, when, in reviewing the first class, "Squeers" is in his element. "W-i-n, win, d-e-r, der, winder, preposition, a casement. . . . B-o-t, bot, t-i-n, tin, bottin, n-e-y, ney, bottinney, adjective, a knowledge of plants. When he has learned that bottinney means a knowledge of plants, he goes and knows 'em. That's our system, Nickleby. It's exactly like the use of the globes. Third boy, what is a horse?"

"A beast, sir!" (Poor little boy, what a frightened little voice it is!)

"So it is, aint it, Nickleby?"

"I believe there is no doubt of that, sir."

"Of course there ain't. A horse is a quadruped, and quadruped's Latin, or Greek, or Hebrew, or some other language that's dead and deserves to be, for beast." Nobody who has not heard Mr. Dickens's "Squeers" make this profound explanation, knows how satirical and funny he makes it.

Squeers's reading of the boy's letters is so good that we wish those letters would never finish; but when he arrives at "Mobbs's mother-in-law," we become excessively amused. "Mobbs's mother-in-law took to bed on hearing that he wouldn't eat fat and has had a succession of cold and boiling water running down her back ever since. She wishes to know, by an early post, where he expects to go to, if he quarrels with his vittles; and with what feelings he could turn up his nose at the cow's-liver broth, after his good master had asked a blessing on it. This was told her in the London newspapers, — not by Mr. Squeers, for he is too kind and too good to set anybody against anybody. Mobbs's mother-in-law is sorry to find Mobbs is discontented, which is sinful and horrid, and hopes Mr. Squeers will flog him into a happier state of mind. With this view she has also stopped his half-penny a week pocket-money, and given a double-bladed knife with a corkscrew in it, which she had brought on purpose for him, to the missionaries. A sulky state of feeling won't do. Cheerfulness and contentment must be kept up. Mobbs come to me!" What varnish is to an oil painting, Mr. Dickens's delivery is to this letter, wherein satire and humor share equal honors. The other scenes of "Mr. and Mrs. Squeers" are portrayed as well as they can be, and the little boy, who, upon hearing the missing "Smike" inquired for by his watchful master, makes his entrance and his exit in the shrill answer, "Please, sir, I think Smike's run away, sir," is quite as much of a little boy as ever lived and talked incessantly; and the school-room melee between "Nickleby" and "Squeers" is vividly and vigorously related.

There are invariably three degrees of excellence. In "Nicholas Nickleby" Mr. Dickens is not his best until the appearance of "Fanny Squeers," "Tilda Price," and "John Browdie." Very comical is the interview between "Fanny Squeers" and "Nickleby." By means of leger-de-figure Mr. Dickens portrays "Nickleby" on one side of his face, and the susceptible "Fanny" on the other, for that simper, lisp, and mien certainly belong to "Mr. Squeers's" offspring. Her "thank you" is perfect, and her reply to "Nickleby's" question, "Shall it be a hard or soft nib?" — referring to the pen which is her excuse for appearing before the young master of arts, — "As soft as possible, if you please," deserves to be perpetuated by a John Leach; although, now I think of it, could only one moment of this dialogue be made enduring, I should fasten my affections upon that wherein, walking away with the pen, 'she exclaims, in a Squeersian ecstasy, "/ never saw such legs in the whole course 'of my life !' — ("the general run of legs at Dotheboys Hall being crooked.")

But there are more plums in the memorable tea-party. "Fanny's" introduction of "Nickleby" to "Matilda Price" — "Mr. Nickleby, 'Tilda; 'Tilda, Mr. Nickleby" — is a fitting overture to one of the cleverest of petite comedies. "John Browdie" with his rich Yorkshire dialect and voluminous laughter is absolutely equal to an epidemic. He breaks out in every direction, and when the interest increases by the appearance of the green-eyed monster, which in "Fanny Squeers" assumes the spiteful, and in the Yorkshireman displays itself in flattening his nose with his clenched fist, it increases after the spectator's own heart. Then when "John Browdie" "dangs his boans and boddy," and "Miss Squeers" "makes a face at "Tilda" (no child, however cultivated in the art, can "make a face" superior to Mr.

Dickens), and the two bosom friends call each other names, winding up with that beautiful climax, “‘Tilda, artful and designing Tilda! — I wouldn’t have a child mimed ‘Tilda, — not to save it from its grave,” — the Tragic Muse herself would smile, and would be forced to laugh outright at John Browdie’s retort, “As to the matter o’ that, it’ll be time eneaf to think about neaming of it when it cooms.” Glorious “John Browdie!” there’s not a trace of Mr. Dickens in him. Yorkshire triumphs over the dress-coat even, and the scene closes while we, like “Oliver,” long for “more.” How Mr. Dickens ne’er o’ersteps the modesty of nature is particularly apparent in this speech of “Browdie’s.” Few are the actors who would not transcend the bounds of propriety, but Mr. Dickens is never more a gentleman than in dealing with passages that are capable of being vulgarly construed. His humor, though always in character, is never tinged with coarseness of manner.

At the conclusion of this admirable reading, impartial criticism declares that of the eight characters portrayed, “Fanny Squeers,” “‘Tilda Price,” and “John Browdie” are unapproachable; that “Mr. and Mrs. Squeers” could be equally well done by actors born for the purpose; that “Nicholas Nickleby” might be better done on the stage, but never is; and that “Smike” is the only character wherein Mr. Dickens falls. To demand of Mr. Dickens that he shall equal the finest “Smikes” of the stage, is asking too much. Mr. Dickens is human, not superhuman. Let it be remembered also that the word failure is used with reservation. Mr. Dickens has set a very difficult task for himself, and one to which nobody else is equal. Compared with his other characters, Mr. Dickens’s “Smike” is unsuccessful because it is vulnerable. “Smike” is not poorly done, but it can be better done. Mr. Dickens’s “Smike” is earnest, pathetic, and his sighing is as truly touching as it is artistically fine. But “Smike” is not pathetic enough, and his monotonous voice frequently degenerates into a whine. This voice undoubtedly arises from Mr. Dickens’s desire to give “Smike” a distinct individuality, and to prevent the intonation of one character from encroaching upon that of another. This individuality he most certainly preserves. There is not a trace of the “Squeers’s,” or of “Nickleby,” or of “Browdie” in it, but the monotonous intonation is unnatural, and therefore unworthy of Mr. Dickens, whose best manner is thorough naturalness. Mr. Dickens could give more variety of tone and still keep “Smike” intact, and had he but this one character to assume, it would undoubtedly be vastly better carried out. At the same time it must be confessed, that the finest “Smikes” known on the stage thus far, could not embody the seven remaining dramatis personae, whose idiosyncrasies Mr. Dickens puts on as easily as he would put on old gloves. It is this versatility that almost silences criticism; and that I am not silent proves a loyalty to art above any other consideration.

Apart from this disappointment in “Smike,” one thing must ever be regretted by lovers of Dickens: i.e., that he has not thought fit to incorporate in this reading a scene between “Monsieur and Madame Mantilini.” Mr. Dickens has deprived us of what would have been a “thing of beauty and a joy forever.” The desire is unreasonable, inasmuch as the “Mantilini’s” did not attend “Mr. Squeers’s” school, but it is human nature to be unreasonable.

V.

“THE STORY OF LITTLE DOMBEY.”

“Charles Dickens is only a caricaturist.” And he wrote the story of “Richard Doubledick, the poor soldier,” which, for naturalness and pathos, is unrivaled in the English language. “Charles Dickens is only a humorist.” And one half of his creations is as tragic as the other half is comic. “Charles Dickens is only a farce actor.” And the tears are still fresh that fell in listening to “The Story of Little Dombey.” Ah, well! whoever escapes being misinterpreted, likewise escapes being head and shoulders above his fellows. Who wears a crown at all must wear a crown of thorns.

Mr. Dickens’s Reading of “Little Dombey” is peculiar; for while the tragic element enters largely into several other Readings, it is so relieved by comedy that laughter holds the balance of power. Every chapter of “Little Dombey,” on the contrary, is written in a minor key. Here and there scherzos are interspersed; but the voice of the “old, old-fashioned child” returns like a sad refrain, and the general effect is melancholy. It is the only one of Mr. Dickens’s Readings that contains a death-bed scene. The Angel of Death hovers over “David Copperfield,” but we do not see “Ham Peggotty” and “Steerforth” die. The ocean yields up its victims and lays their bodies upon the shore at our feet. There is solemnity without pathos. But the spirit of “Little Dombey” takes wing before our eyes, and in its flight touches heart-strings that respond with saddest music. Therefore “The Story of Little Dombey” is the least popular of all Mr. Dickens’s Readings. He, the comedian, the farce-actor, succeeds in making people very miserable; and people dislike to be made miserable. They prefer to laugh. They object to any draft upon their sympathies. Put tragedy before them in such guise as to excite no emotion, and they enjoy it. Make them feel it, and it ceases to be an amusement. “I don’t like Ristori’s ‘Marie Antoinette,’” said an unknown voice behind me not long ago. “I don’t call that acting; it is real. If she didn’t make me cry, I’d enjoy it. I tell you, that’s not what I call art.” In the most popular of all dictionaries, art is defined thus: “Art n., The reverse of nature.”

We are first ushered into the presence of “Rich Mr. Dombey,” who “sat in the corner of his wife’s darkened bedchamber, in the great arm-chair by the bedside,” and of “Rich Mr. Dombey’s son,” who “lay tucked up warm in a little basket, carefully placed on a low settee in front of the fire and close to it, as if his constitution were analogous to that of a muffin, and it was essential to toast him brown while he was very new.” In the reading of one sentence Mr. Dickens places before us both father and son. “Mr. Dombey was rather bald, rather red, and rather stern and pompous. Mr. Dombey’s son was very bald, and very red, and rather crushed and spotty in his general effect, — as yet.” With Mr. Dickens, one or two adjectives answer the purpose of a whole paint-box.

““ He will be christened Paul, of course. His father’s name, Mrs. Dombey, and his grandfather’s. I wish his grandfather were alive this day.’ And again he said, ‘Dombey and Son.’” After this. “Mr. Dombey, Sr.” takes positive form and substance. “Mr. Micawber” is pompous, “Dr. Blimber” is pompous; but the pomposity of this rich gentleman, in a blue coat and bright buttons, is as unlike other styles of pomposity as Anno Domini is unlike Anno Dombei. “Mr. Dombey” is so pleased with himself — and his firm — that he is absolutely genial — for him; so much so, that he positively acknowledges the presence of that other child, six years old, and says, “Florence, you may go and look at your pretty brother, if you like. Don’t touch him!” “How is it possible,” asks Scudo, “to transmit to posterity, through the medium of cold language, an inflexion of voice, a look, a gesture, a pause,, those thousand shades of art and beauty that characterize the style of a great virtuoso?” I thought of this, and nothing but this, when Mr. Dickens paused, and summed up “rich Mr. Dombey and Son” in a motion of the hands and that one short command, “Don’t touch him!" If he had crushed "Florence" beneath his heel, her insignificance could not have been made more apparent.

She is not a "Dombey." "Mrs. Chick is," and when the sister of her brother flings her arms about that brother's neck, exclaiming, —

"My dear Paul! This last child is quite a Dombey! He's such a perfect Dombey!" — Mr. Dickens assumes the air of that lady whose immortal receipt will be incorporated in the world's proverbial philosophy as the grand moral panacea. How like a "Dombey" she is, in her exhortation there in the chamber of death; how she advises "Fanny" "to make an effort;" how she places her ear close to the mother's face in expectation of a reply; how she touches her and almost shakes her in order that "Mrs. Dombey" may be roused "to make an effort!" It is very real, this monologue of "Mrs. Chick's," but no more real than "Florence's" appealing cry, "Mamma! O dear mamma! O dear mamma!" — no more real than the silence of that departing spirit, — no better than the closing of this scene. "The doctor gently brushed the scattered ringlets of the child aside from the face and mouth of the mother. And thus, clinging fast to the frail spar within her arms, the mother drifted out upon the dark and unknown sea that rolls round all the world." The reading is worthy of the writing.

In scene second the "odd child" is no longer "crushed and spotty in general effect," but sits in a little chair beside his father and talks, and it seems to me that Mr. Dickens is particularly happy — if such an adjective can be applied to so unhappy a subject — in the voice he assumes in "Little Dombey." It is almost the same voice employed by him in "Smike;" but what is objectionable in the latter, appears to be eminently characteristic of the former. "Smike" is a youth of nineteen, and may possess variety of intonation; whereas a treble monotone harmonizes with "Paul's" years. Mr. Dickens's management of this voice, too, so completely expresses physical exhaustion and premature decay, — is so removed from anything grown up or manly, — that having once heard his "Little Dombey," it is difficult to conceive how else the child can be successfully treated. The dialogue between "Dombey and Son" about money is a wonderful contrast of two natures, considering that the two natures are delineated by one man, and when "Paul" silences his father by saying, "As you are so rich, if money can do anything, and isn't cruel, I wonder it didn't save me my mamma. It can't make me strong and quite well either. I am so tired sometimes, and my bones ache so, that I don't know what to do," — a feeling of utter weariness possesses the attentive listener.

Mr. Dickens is also very effective in his description of "Mrs. Pipchin" the great manager of children, "whose husband had broken his heart in pumping water out of 'some Peruvian mines.'" — "Well! a very respectable way of doing it," mused "Mr. Dombey" to whose voice Mr. Dickens accords a hard, metallic ring. "Miss Pankey" never is quite so much of "a mild, little blue-eyed morsel," as when Mr. Dickens relates how "she was led in from captivity by the ogress herself, and instructed that nobody who sniffed before visitors ever went to heaven," and "Master Bitherstone's "perennial agony at being borne away "to have something else done to him with salt-water, from which he always returned very blue and dejected," is not fully realized until the author's reading throws light upon it. But the comedy does not get fully under way until the interview between "Little Dombey" and the exemplary "Pipchin," where the old-fashioned child so "fixes" his teacher that she finally says, —

"Never you mind, sir. Remember the story of the little boy that was gored to death by a mad bull, for asking questions."

"If the bull was mad, how did he know that the boy had asked questions? Nobody can go and whisper secrets to a mad bull. I don't believe that story."

"You don't believe it, sir?"

"No."

"Not if it should happen to have been a tame bull, you little infidel?"

The weird, reasoning boy is seen one moment, the mottled-faced, hook-nosed, hard gray-eyed "Pipchin" next, and "Little Paul's" earnestness is inexpressibly droll.

Although Mr. Dickens never waits for his "points" to "tell," — insisting that they shall take effect as they fly, or pass unrecognized, — he never neglects a word that can be dressed up to make an appearance. "Little Paul "on the sea-shore dislikes the company of his nurse, and is well pleased when she strolls away to "pick up shells and acquaintances." It never occurred to me that there was a world of meaning in this final word, and yet, after Mr. Dickens pronounces it, its significance dawns upon me and I behold that nurse in all manner of situations with all manner of people.

Solemnly funny with "Mrs. Pipchin," "Paul" is solemnly grave with "Florence."

“If you were in India, Floy, I should — what is it that mamma did? I forget.”

“Love me?”

“No, no. Don’t I love you now, Floy? What is it? — Died. If you were in India, I should die, Floy.”

How the tired head grows more and more tired in the endeavor to remember what mamma did! But there is hope in the voice and eagerness in the look when “Paul” points to the horizon and asks what it is that the sea keeps on saying.

“Very often afterwards, in the midst of their talk, he would break off”, to try to understand what it was that the waves were always saying; and would rise up in his couch to look towards that invisible region. — far away.”

Mr. Dickens is not a reader as others are readers. He is something better. There is a death-knell in those concluding words, “far away.”

Dropping the minor and taking up a major key, Mr. Dickens introduces us to “Dr. Blimber’s” hot-house for the blowing of young gentlemen. He dives into the intellectual garden and brings forth all the plums with such gusto that we feast upon them as if they were a fruit just discovered and eaten for the first time. When Mr. Dickens produces the plum, “Mrs. Blimber,” it cannot be truthfully said that the lady “who was not learned herself but pretended to be, and that did quite as well,” is good enough to eat; but this particular plum is most certainly good enough to stuff and put under a glass case. She makes but one remark, i. e., “that if she could have known Cicero” (going from the bottom to the top of a vocal staircase on the name of this distinguished Roman gentleman), “she thought she could have died contented.” Given a bone, and the naturalist can draw the skeleton. Given “Mrs. Blimber” as she vocally goes upstairs with Cicero, and the mother of “Miss Blimber” lives as long as we live.

As for “Dr. Blimber,” he may at any moment burst with importance. ““And how do you do, sir?” he said to Mr. Dombey, ‘and how is my little friend?’“ When the doctor left off, the great clock in the hall seemed (to Paul, at least) to take him up, and to go on saying, over and over again, “How, is, my, lit, tie, friend, — how, is, my, lit, tie, friend.” Mr. Dickens defies the great clock by ticking himself.

Ah, but “Toots,” “Young Toots,” otherwise “P. Toots, Esquire, Brighton, Sussex!” You may have loved him from childhood, you may have seen him without his boots and sympathized with him in his unrequited affection, but until you have made Toots's acquaintance, through the medium of Mr. Dickens, you have no idea how he looks, or how he talks. When "Toots" puts his thumb in his mouth, looks sheepish, and roars forth, "How are you?" I feel (and I am sure you experience the same sensation) as the man in the play must feel when, for the first time, he recognizes his long-lost brother with the strawberry mark on his left arm. Mr. Dickens's "Toots" bears the unmistakable strawberry mark. His sheepishness is not that of a country-bumpkin, not by any means. "Toots" is a gentleman. It is such sheepishness as only can accompany a voice that appears to proceed from some cavern ingeniously concealed in "Toots's" boots.

Dramatic genius may soar higher than Mr. Dickens soars in "Toots," but when this heavily good-natured young gentleman says, —

"Sit down, Dombey," —

When, after inspecting "Dombey," he asks, —

"Who's your tailor?" —

When, turning the crank of his organ with one tune, he stares and puts the question, "I say, — It's not of the slightest consequence, you know, but I should wish to mention it, — how are you, you know?" — When he dashes into "Paul's" bedroom and blurts forth, "I say — Dombey — what do you think about?"

"Oh, I think about a great many things."

"Do you though? — I don't myself" —

When "Mr. Toots" finishes his academic career, puts on a ring, and calls his former head gardener, "Blimber!" — when at the "Blimber" party his brain and fingers become chaotic in buttoning and unbuttoning the bottom button of his waistcoat, and turning his wristbands up and down, — when, finally, upon being asked by "Mr. Baps," the dancing-master, what is to be done with "your raw materials," he replies, "Cook 'em," — I fear that I am tempted to throw off my allegiance to the Tragic Muse and acknowledge that comedy is, after all, the greatest blessing in life. The oftener "Toots" says "How are you?" the better you like this profound question. It improves upon acquaintance, and you would very gladly take it three times a day all the year round — before eating. I hope therefore I may be pardoned if I venture to declare that the tout ensemble is perfect.

Who can ever forget little "Briggs" that has seen Mr. Dickens mournfully rub his face, — I mean "Briggs's" face, — muttering that "his head ached ready to split, and that he should wish himself dead if it wasn't for his mother and a blackbird he had at home?" That blackbird brings out the boy-nature as nothing else can. When "Miss Blimber," tells "Dombey" that she is "going out for a con-sti-tution-al," she is just as comical as such a "dry, crisp, sandy Ghoul" can be; and more so. As "Miss Blimber" pronounces "con-sti-tu-tion-al," it sounds like a vocal illustration of a Virginia fence. It is here, there, and everywhere. "Miss Blimber" peppers "Dombey" with it, and although nobody in the flesh ever took such liberties with a respectable word of five syllables, yet the effect of this "con-sti-tu-tion-al" is so exhilarating that the sturdiest pre-Raphaelite is disarmed. Se non e vero, e ben trovato. "Mr. Feeder B. A." also comes out beautifully in the recitation of that remarkable poetry, —

"Had I a heart for falsehood framed,
I ne'er could injure you!"

But the old refrain of the old, old fashioned child breaks in upon the merriment, and while laughter still rings through the air, we stand upon the verge of a young grave. The little, thoughtful face, the tired, treble voice come back and ask, —

"What do you think I mean to do when I grow up, Mrs. Pipchin?. . . I mean to put my money all together in one bank, — never try to get any more, — go away into the country with my darling Florence, — have a beautiful garden, fields, and woods, and live there with her all my life. . . . That's what I mean to do, when I — 'he stopped and pondered for a moment — ' if I grow up.'" "Dombey, Sr.," "Dombey, Sr.," if one of your type is within sound of that piteous voice, his heart will soften, and his godless pride fail him!

To describe a death-bed scene, which is its own best description, would be to attempt to paint the lily. Mr. Dickens breathes a vital spark into the text, and what was previously an outline, is filled out with the substance. There stands the stern father, who bends down to the pillowed head, listening as the child murmurs, "Don't be so sorry for me! Indeed, I am quite happy!" — There is the loving nurse who holds the wasted hand in hers and puts it to her lips and breast. — There are brother and sister locked in each other's arms. — There is the final moment when, folding his hands prayerfully behind his sister's neck, the dying boy exclaims, "Mamma is like you, Floy. I know her by the face! But tell them that the picture on the stairs at school is not divine enough. The light about the head is shining as I go!"

"The golden ripple on the wall came back again, and nothing else stirred in the room. The old, old fashion! The fashion that came in with our first garments, -and will last unchanged until our race has run its course, and the wide firmament is rolled up like a scroll. The old, old fashion, — Death!"

"Oh, thank God, all who see it, for that older fashion yet, of Immortality! And look upon us, angels of young children, with regards not quite estranged, when the swift river bears us to the ocean!"

Why is it that through glistening tears we see the imaginary pillow illuminated? Why do we know that mothers who have lost young children listen with bowed heads and yet with overflowing gratitude? Because "out of the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh." Because the reader leads us through the dark valley of the shadow of Death into the bright gladness of Immortality.

Ten characters! and Mr. Dickens fills them all without fear and without reproach!

VI.

"DOCTOR MARIGOLD."

Of all Mr. Dickens's Readings, this of "Doctor Marigold" is from a literary point of view, the most complete. It is the most complete, because with the exception of a few paragraphs here and there, it embraces the entire story as originally written. "Doctor Marigold's Prescription" is given and taken without any perceptible diminution of the original dose. What a happy, healthy world this would be if all prescriptions were equally beneficial in their results!

Who that has grown sick at heart at the hollowness and conventionality of "society" wonders that Mr. Dickens selects his heroes and heroines from humble life? No author has done so much to raise the level of human nature by simply laying bare the generous impulses of the lowly. The obscurer the profession the more tenderly Mr. Dickens treats its followers; carrying out the scriptural prophecy of the first being last, and the last first.

In rescuing the Cheap Jack from the inevitable oblivion entailed by the expanding network of railroads, Mr. Dickens has laid a beautiful offering upon a neglected altar, and in himself assuming the character of “Doctor Marigold,” he has made at least one Cheap Jack known to thousands who otherwise would have passed him by on the other side, failing to recognize an innate nobility worthy of the highest station.

Less difficult of portrayal than any other Reading, — changes of character being less, — “ Doctor Marigold “ is nevertheless more entirely sympathetic, for, to use one of the “Doctor’s” own expressions, his simple, touching story takes hold of you and “rolls upon you “ at the beginning and continues to roll on to the end. The moment that Mr. Dickens stands before his desk, which on this occasion is transformed into the footboard of a Cheap Jack Cart, he makes you feel that “Doctor Marigold” is a man to be loved. How is it possible then, being en rapport with his second self, not to love him?

To all intents and purposes Mr. Dickens appears in a sleeved-waistcoat, “ the strings of which is always gone behind,” and those who may boast of their eyes as “ a pair o’ patent double million magnifyin’ gas microscopes of hextra power,” ,can very distinctly perceive an old white hat reposing peacefully upon Mr. Dickens’s head.

Perhaps Mr. Dickens does not give as much color and effect as might be given to the parallel drawn between Cheap Jacks and Dear Jacks, — as fine a satire on political hawkers as ever was written, — but the moment “Doctor Marigold” arrives at the Ipswich market-place and notices his wife that is to be, “appreciating him wery highly,” the admirable portraiture begins.

“Doctor Marigold’s” description of his wife is inimitable. “A man can’t write his eye, nor yet can a man write his voice, nor the rate of his talk, nor the quickness of his action, nor his general spicy way,” remarks the original “Doctor Marigold,” so it is useless to make the attempt; but those who have not and never expect to hear it, will go down to their graves in complete ignorance of what a “temper in a cart” means. “Thirteen years of temper in a palace would try the worst of you; but thirteen years of temper in a cart would try the best of you. You are kept so very close to it, — in a cart, — you see. There’s thousands of couples, among you, getting on like sweet-ile upon a whetstone, in houses five and six pairs of stairs high, that would go to the Divorce Court, — in a cart. Whether the jolting makes it worse, I don’t undertake to decide; but in a cart it does come home to you arid stick to you. Wiolence — in a cart — is so wiolent, and aggrawation — in a cart — is so aggrawatin’.” No one but Dickens would have dreamed of this conceit. No one but Dickens can endow the doleful confession with such unconscious humor. There never was so much good humor in’ so much bad humor.

And what an important creature “Doctor Marigold’s” dog becomes just from one or two references to his extraordinary sagacity! “My dog knew as well when she was on the turn as I did. Before she broke out, he would give a howl — and bolt.” (The tone of the “howl” and action of the “bolt” are unutterably expressive.) “How he knew it, was a mystery to me; but the sure and certain knowledge of it would wake him out of his soundest sleep, and he would give a howl, — and bolt. At such times I wished I was him.” As the dog bolts I think I recognize the breed, but not being quite certain on this point, I shall not commit myself.

“The worst of it was,” continues “Doctor Marigold,” “we had a daughter born to us, and I love children with all my heart.” When the good “Doctor” clasps his hands and presses them to his breast, as if he were embracing that pretty daughter with the dark curling hair, you feel as if he really did love children. Moreover, you feel morally certain that Mr. Dickens loves children too. Does he not put a child into his books whenever art opportunity offers? And does he not make opportunities when they refuse to offer themselves? Think of “Little Nell,” “The Marchioness,” “Paul and Florence Dombey,” “Oliver Twist,” “Little Dick,” “Tiny Tim,” and the many outlines of little folks that are as good and better than most people’s real children. Then he has written “A Child’s History of England,” and I am quite sure that he did not undertake it because children’s books “pay.” Of course “Doctor Marigold” loves children. Most expressive of tenderness is the way in which he holds a book to his breast when he is supposed to be selling goods with the suffering “little Sophy” clinging around his neck. The curly head is surely there, and the transition from the Cheap Jack with which “Marigold” hurls at his gaping audience, to the caresses and questionings of the father, are as artistic as they are natural. When, however, “Little Sophy” dies without warning in “Marigold’s” arms, and he staggers back into the cart, exclaiming to his wife, “Quick! Shut the door! Don’t let those laughing people see! . . . O woman, woman, you’ll never catch my little Sophy by her hair again, for she’s dead and has flown away from you!” the father’s expression of grief is too loud for the situation. “Marigold’s” endeavor is to keep the crowd in ignorance of his sorrows; therefore, however terrible his agony, he must surely muffle the cry of his heart. Did “Doctor Marigold” shout as Mr. Dickens does, he would alarm the entire neighborhood. Therefore, in spite of his earnestness at this particular moment, Mr. Dickens may be criticised on the score of exaggeration. The same words, delivered in an undertone, would be equally intense, and much more natural.

All liberally educated persons have seen at least one giant, and some of us have speculated with melancholy interest upon the private lives of giants in general; but none of us knew what any giant in particular went through until “Doctor Marigold” became acquainted with “Rinaldo di Velasco, otherwise Pickleson,” who, when on view, figured at length “as a hancient Roman.” “He had a little head, and less in it; he had weak eyes and weak knees; and, altogether you couldn’t look at him without feeling that there was greatly too much of him, both for his jints and his mind.” Add Dickens’s manner to Dickens’s matter, and what wonder that our feelings are too much for us, and find vent in laughter over the “hancient Roman’s” extremities? This “giant, otherwise Pickleson,” confides to “Doctor Marigold” the sad story of “Mini’s” deaf and dumb step-daughter, whereupon the “Doctor” remarks: “He was such a very languid young man, that I don’t know how long it didn’t take him to get this story out; but it passed through his defective circulation to his top extremity in course of lime.” Well, I don’t know how Mr. Dickens does it, and I almost believe he does not know himself, — the inspiration of the divine afflatus descends upon him, — but the complete vacuity of his face as he pronounces the word “very,” and the languor which accompanies his delivery of this sentence, absolutely make you as limp in joints and mind as “Rinaldo di Velasco” himself. You begin to feel attenuated, and are only saved from the long-drawn agony by “Doctor Marigold’s” presentation to the giant of a sixpence, “and he laid it out in two threepenn’orths of gin-and-water, which so brisked him up that he sang the Favorite Comic of Shivery Shakey, aint it cold? — a popular effect which his master had tried every other means to get out of him, as a hancient Roman, wholly in vain.” The ludicrousness of “a hancient Roman” singing the “Favorite Comic of Shivery Shakey” is brought out [so cleverly by Mr. Dickens that if you have never before been guilty of the indiscretion, you become enamored of the Queen’s English, convinced that no other language, living or dead, can express such humor as this.

Then Mr. Dickens goes to work — no, he never seems to work, and that's the beauty of his Readings; everything comes without any apparent effort, — and makes a character out of two remarks. Nobody can forget "Mim," the "wery hoarse man," the giant's master, after his declaration, in a bronchitis-ial voice, — sounding as if it had been rasped with a blunted file all the way down, — that he will exchange his deaf and dumb step-daughter for a "pair of braces;" and nobody can forget the tender humor of "Doctor Marigold" in his narration of how he taught his second "Sophy" her alphabet, nor the "Doctor's" account of his loneliness when "Sophy" is sent to school. At last the two years pass by, and "Doctor Marigold" goes to fetch "Sophy." "The new cart was finished, — yellow outside, relieved with wermilion, and brass fittings." Now the words "relieved with wermilion," as words, are not funny, and yet when Mr. Dickens is "relieved with wermilion" his face looks such unutterable things that even the most stoical fancies, as did "Sophy" herself, once, that the "Doctor" is the c-a-r-t. But it is only a fancy. Mr. Dickens is the living, loving "Doctor Marigold" when he starts at sight of "Sophy," who has grown up to be a woman; when he dares not go to her, but rubs his hands together, and, looking down, says timidly, "I feel that I am but a rough chap in a sleeved-waistcoat;" when he at last takes courage to give her the old sign, and "Sophy" clasps him round the neck.

"I don't know what a fool I didn't make of myself," says the "Doctor," "until we all three settled down into talking without sound, as if there was a something soft and pleasant spread over the whole world for us."

That is it. Mr. Dickens has spread something soft and pleasant over the whole world for us.

Having acquired an affection for "Rinaldo di Velasco, otherwise Pickleson" ("whose mother let him out and spent the money"), it is with delight that we at last hear him speak. "'Doctor Marigold,' — I give his words without a hope of conveying their feebleness, — who is the strange young man that hangs about your carts?" "The strange young man?" I gives him back, thinking he meant Sophy, and his languid circulation had dropped a syllable. 'Doctor,' he returns, with a pathos calculated to draw a tear from even a manly eye, 'I am weak, but not so weak yet as that I don't know my words. I repeat them, Doctor. The strange — young — man!'"

"Bottom" once saw a voice. If everybody could be "Bottom" and see the giant's voice, everybody might go about with his own theatre in his own pocket. Mr. Dickens outdoes himself. The contrast between the giant's purple face, swelling with effort, and the trickle of sound squeezed out at the risk of breaking every blood-vessel in "Pickleson's" head, is absolute perfection. A mountain never brought forth a smaller mouse, nor one that was so much worth the trouble. .

What can be said of the remainder of "Doctor Marigold's" story, saving that it is charmingly narrated? When the unselfish "Doctor" puts "Sophy's" hand in that of her young husband, saying, "Doctor Marigold's last prescription, to betaken for life," — it seems very life-like; when "Sophy" writes from China, "Dearest father, not a week ago I had a darling little daughter, but I am so well that they let me write these words to you. Dearest and best father, I hope my child may not be deaf and dumb, but I do not yet know," — "Sophy" herself could hardly read the letter with more feeling; when the "Doctor" "knocks up" his Christmas-eve dinner and declared that such a beefsteak pudding as he made "is enough to put a man in good-humor with everything except the two bottom buttons of his waistcoat," — even the occupant of a boardinghouse inclines to the belief that he too has had a sufficiently good dinner to be at variance with the two bottom buttons of his waistcoat; and when the "Doctor" is startled out of his after-dinner nap by the real tread of a real child, who peeps in at the door of the cart, exclaiming, "Grandfather!" and the grandfather cries out, "O my God! she can speak!" and when "Sophy," and her husband, and their child, and the "Doctor" are "shaking themselves together, and the happy yet pitying tears fall rolling down the Doctor's face," — those tears steal into our eyes as well; and when Mr. Dickens hurries away, there seems to be more love and unselfishness in the world than before we took Doctor Marigold's prescription.

"If that fellar hasn't a heart," muttered a broad-shouldered, fine-looking countryman -who sat behind me at a- reading of "Doctor Marigold," and who emphasized his words by thumping a soft felt hat, — "if that fellar hasn't a heart, may I be everlastingly skewered! He's made me make a fool of myself, and I swiney! I wish Sal was here!"

"BOOTS AT THE HOLLY TREE INN."

There are some things that, once possessed, become so inalienably portions of ourselves as to render it a marvel how any one ever lived without them. Rubber boots for women, horse-cars, and watches are among them. What rubber boots, horse-cars, and watches are to the outer man and woman, certain works of art are to the inner man and woman. The light of the world would grow dim to many were certain bits of music, of canvas, of sculpture, and of architecture annihilated. This feeling is especially excited by particular books. Some books we approach on state occasions with much dignity and ceremony, knowing it to be highly literary and respectable to claim their acquaintance. We bind them in calf and give them the place of honor on our library shelves, where we permit them to remain undisturbed the greater part of the year. There are other books that we love just as we love intimate friends. We care not how they look, whether they are well or ill-dressed, and in all probability we never ask them into the library. But we do ask them into our private room, and insist upon their remaining, that we may enjoy their companionship at all times and seasons. These are the human books. They are not too good to speak to us in a language that we all understand, and confess to a sympathy with the frailty of our common nature. Such are the books of Charles Dickens. Occasionally we do permit his two-volume novels to go downstairs, and be imposing; but when it comes to his shorter stories, particularly those inspired by the approach of Christmas, we oblige them to remain en deshabille upstairs, that we may be talked to whenever we are in the mood to listen.

Unique, among these Christmas Stories, is "The Holly Tree." That cold, heartless monster, the snow, never did a better deed than when it snowed up the bashful man, "Charley," at the Yorkshire wayside inn, in consequence of which the bashful man "began to associate the Christmas time of year with human interest, and with some inquiry, into, and some care for, the lives of those by whom he found himself surrounded." The snow, I repeat, never did a better deed, for otherwise, by the bashful man's own confession, we never should have been made the happier by his "Christmas Carols," and "Boots" never would have related the adventures of "Mr. and Mrs. Harry Walmars, Junior." So for once the snow thawed when it was coldest.

"But" Boots's story is utterly impossible." Why, so much the better! Are not some of the most delightful stories in the world as removed from fact as fancy can make them? Was not fancy made for this purpose? Are we always to sit on a pre-Raphaelite stump and contemplate a pre-Raphaelite cabbage?

Do any of us believe in the possibility of “The Tempest,” or of “Midsummer Night’s Dream,” and yet could we live comfortably without them? If no one ever dreamed, where would be the consolation of waking hours? Fancy is the oil that keeps Reality’s wheels in motion. “Mr. and Mrs. Harry Walmars, Junior,” never thought of a way to Gretna Green. Of course not; but the story is charmingly quaint and is as pure and fresh as morning dew. I would not lose the recollection of that little creature, in the sky-blue mantle tucked under the arm of her young lover, who walks off “much bolder than Brass” (with a capital B) — for a wilderness of disagreeable facts. Truth is not necessarily a virtue.

There are three branches on the original “Holly Tree.” Leaving untouched the first and third branches, which are better on the tree than off it, Mr. Dickens cuts down the second and brings it into the Reading-Room that we may enjoy its refreshing verdure. In Mr. Dickens’s rendering of “The Boots,” criticism does not know “where to have him.” Search as you may for a weak point, the search is in vain; and after a first hearing you abandon yourself to unalloyed pleasure. “Boots” stands before you telling his story in his own naive, natural way.

And “Boots” is a captivating fellow. I am not surprised that “Mr. and Mrs. Harry Walmars, Junior” were excessively fond of him and decided to give him two thousand guineas a year as head-gardener, — when the time should come for them to have a house in a forest, keep bees and a cow, and live entirely on milk and honey. Such a man deserves such a salary, particularly if condemned to such a diet. You cannot avoid liking “Boots” when you read him; but when you see and hear him, the relationship is of a tenderer nature. For “Boots” is a diamond in the rough. He is distantly related to “Sam Weller.” He is a “Sam Weller,” whose natural keenness has received no polish from city life, and whose humor has been softened by sentiment and a contemplation of nature as seen in garden-bulbs. I am not quite sure, — it is very difficult to make up one’s mind on such an important point, — but I think that if I were in affliction, or even comfortably unhappy, I should prefer the services of “Boots” to those of “Sam Weller.” Prosperity and the prejudice “Tony Weller” entertained against poetry, robbed “Sam” of the one attribute needed to make him an angel. This attribute “Boots” possesses. He is a poet in disguise. This is proved by his delicate appreciation of the loves of “Mr. and Mrs. Harry Walmers, Junior.” “On the whole, sir, the contemplation o’ them two babbies had a tendency to make me feel as if I was in love myself, — only I didn't exactly know who with. ... I don't know, sir, — perhaps you do, — why it made a man fit to make a fool of himself, to see them two pretty babbies a-lying there in the clear, still, sunny day, not dreaming half so hard when they was asleep as they done when they was awake. But Lord! when you come to think of yourself, you know, and what a game you have been up to ever since you was in your own cradle, and what a poor sort of a chap you are, arter all, that's where it is! Don't you see, sir?" "Here's wisdom for you; chunks of it!" "Boots's" sum total of life is as philosophical as his contemplation of youthful innocence is poetical.

"What was the curious-es-est thing Boots had seen? Well! He didn't know. He couldn't momentarily guess what was the curious-es-est thing he had seen, — unless it was a Unicorn, — and he see him once in spirits at a fair." However clever we may be in the specialty for which we were naturally designed, not one of us but desires to be considered as born for something else, and we are never so complacent as when attempting that unattainable something. Even "Boots" betrays this amiable weakness. He approaches the word "curious-es-est," with a look of admiration, clings to every syllable with affection, and only lets go his hold because conversation would otherwise come to a dead lock. Therefore "Boots" goes on, and the richness, the flavor, the bouquet of his tone, is as appetizing as transfigured bitters. When "Master Harry" says, "Cobbs," how should you spell Norah if you was asked?" and when "Cobbs" gives him "his individual views, sir, respectin' the spelling o' that name," one understands what is meant by the rare word "unction." The dialogue between "Master Harry" and "Cobbs" respecting "Norah" is to the manner born, and childhood never was more deliciously illustrated than in the air and expression assumed by "Master Harry" when, stopping at "The Holly Tree Inn" en route for Gretna Green, he gives his orders to "Cobbs." "We should like some cakes after dinner, and two apples — and jam!" If you have ever been a child and loved jam to distraction, — you never were a child unless you did love jam to distraction, — and remember how you gazed at it in hermetically sealed glass jars, with eyes as big as saucers, — wishing your eyes were saucers full of jam, — you know how Mr. Dickens treats this cabalistic word. It is your youthful aspiration, your eyes, your hermetically sealed jars reduced to sound. While "Cobbs" describes "Master Harry" sitting "behind his breakfast cup a tearing away at the jelly, as if he had been his own father,” you understand just how he is tearing.

“The way in which the women of that house,” says “Cobbs,” “ without exception, — everyone of them — married and single took to that boy when they heard the story, is saperizing.” (“Cobbs” is almost as devoted in his attentions to this word as to his former verbal Dulcinea.) “It was as much as could be done to keep ‘em from dashing into the room and kissing him. — They climbed up all sorts of places, at the risk of their lives, to look at him through a pane of glass, — and they was seven deep at the key-hole. “By means of this key-hole” Cobbs “unlocks the door to such sense of humor as has not been exhausted by the previous drain upon it.

Great as “Master Harry” is at the moment of his calling for “jam,” I think he is equally so when, upon being asked whether “Mrs. Harry Walmers, Junior” is fatigued, he Replies, “Yes, she is tired, Cobbs; bat she is not used to be away from home, and she has been in low spirits again. Cobbs, do you think you could bring a baked apple, please? Norah’s rather partial to baked apples, and I think one would rouse her.” A father of a large family — John Rogers for example — could not speak with more confidence, or with greater knowledge of human nature.

But the pretty story, perfect as it is, will come to an end, and when, — ” Master Harry” stooping down to kiss “ Norah” for the last time, — one of the many chambermaids peeping through the door, shrilly cries out, “It’s a shame to part ‘em!” that chambermaid springs from Mr. Dickens’s head as Minerva sprang from the head of Jove, and stands armed and equipped for the fray.

Who, after listening to “Cobbs,” does not wish with him “ that there was an impossible place where two such babies could make an impossible marriage, and live impossibly happy ever after?” and who does not shudder at thought of the era when universal education will have made such inroads upon even “The Holly Tree Inn” as to abolish all use of bad grammar, and proclaim “Cobbs’s “ occupation gone! See Mr. Dickens in his “Boots” and you wish universal education at the bottom of that well where truth is said to lie.

“There’s a destiny in these things, gentlemen, we can’t help it,” said Dickens’s Bagman, upon recounting the prowess of his uncle in absorbing the contents of quart measures. The Bagman was undoubtedly correct in his deduction. There must be a destiny in these things and in all things, else Mr. Dickens would have gone down to his grave before being able to decide upon what selections from “The Pickwick Papers” to make for his Readings. To the mind unilluminated by destiny there seems no good reason why “Mr. Bob Sawyer’s Party” should have been preferred to a thousand and one equally good episodes. In reading the book, this particular party takes no more hold of our affections than many others. Hence it is safe to conclude that there is a destiny in these things, and that Mr. Dickens was as much born to read “Mr. Bob Sawyer’s Party” as he was to create it. After seeing him at this party, the hypothesis becomes as self-evident as any axiom in Euclid. What has struck you heretofore as a diamond no better than its fellows, is magically transformed into a Kohinoor.

And when I say “magically transformed,” I mean it in all soberness of criticism. Whoever thought, in reading “Pickwick,” of giving any special attention to “Mrs. Raddle’s” housemaid? Her appearance and disappearance are almost simultaneous. She is a dirty, slip-shod girl, in black cotton stockings. That is all. And what does she say? “Please, Mr. Sawyer, Missis Raddle wants to speak to you.”

Anything else? Yes.

“Does Mr. Sawyer live here?” mildly inquires “Mr. Pickwick” “at” Mrs. Raddle’s” front door.

“Sawyer!” slowly echoes the Black Stockings, whose mental circulation is almost as languid as “Rinaldo di Velasco’s” physical circulation. “O, yes, Sawyer; he lives here. Sawyer’s the first floor. It’s the door straight afore you, when you gets to the top of the stairs.”

And is this all? No; there is one more scene.

“You can’t have no warm water.”

“No warm water?” exclaims the horrified host, “Bob.”

“No,” continues “Betsy.” “Missis Raddle said you warn’t to have none.”

“Bring up the water instantly, — instantly!”

“No, I can’t. Missis Raddle raked out the kitchen fire afore she went to bed, and locked up the kittle.”

Here is the whole of “Betsy.” From this small side bone that any but a consummate artist would throw away as having very little meat upon it, Mr. Dickens creates an incomparably comic character. The moment “Betsy” opens her mouth she is an accomplished fact. A dirtier, more slip-shod, more stolid, more irretrievably stupid girl never lived. Mr. Dickens’s list of her clothes includes nothing but a pair of black cotton stockings, but when he brings her on the stage she not only wears black stockings with slippers down at the heel that drop off on the stairs, but a short gown, the original color of which is cleverly concealed by dirt, and a check apron, one-half of which is conspicuous by its absence. Her sleeves are rolled up, displaying very red arms, and that portion of her scrubby hair which is not standing on end, is maliciously attempting to put out “Betsy’s” eyes. “Betsy’s” legs look like sticks of black sealing-wax, as if in mourning for the rest of her neglected person, and are finished off at the knees with white strings. An owl in the brightest noonday sun never was more dazed or more incapable of an idea. A voice never expressed more thorough individuality, for “Betsy” has a cold in the head. She could not possibly fulfil her mission on earth if she had not a cold in the head. It gives a muffled, sepulchral tone to her words absolutely necessary to make what she says produce the desired effect upon “Bob Sawyer” and his guests. “Betsy,” however, is not such a fool as to be unaware that something must be amiss between “Mr. Sawyer” and his landlady. Consequently, the air of mystery with which she idiotically glares at “Mr. Sawyer,” or darts her head forward, — like a turtle from beneath its shell, — or slowly shakes that head, is not without solemnity. The amiable landlady, “Mrs. Raddle,” is quite as well portrayed; but something is expected of “Mrs. Raddle,” — whereas “Betsy” takes you entirely by surprise. If a donkey lisped in numbers you could not be more astonished. The former merely realizes fond hopes. The scene between “Mrs. Raddle,” “Mr. Sawyer,” and “Mr. Ben Allen,” is a farce in itself, while “Mrs. Raddle’s” final expose of “Mr. Sawyer’s” delinquencies, as she scolds over the banisters, the rumbling of “Mrs. Raddle’s” voice, proceeding from beneath distant bedclothes, and the lady’s parting compliments to inoffensive “Mr. Pickwick,” “Get along with you, yon old wretch! Old enough to be his grandfather, you villain! You’re worse than any of ‘em,” — are rich in humor.

“Mr. Bob Sawyer” is not every inch himself, for the reason that “Mr. Sawyer” labors under depressing influences throughout the entire evening.

He is as much himself as he can be, considering the condition of his mind and pocket, and is really sublime in his impudence, when, seeing his guests ordered out of the house by “Mrs. Raddle,” he turns to “Jack Hopkins” with an injured look, and informs “Jack” that it is all his fault, “because he will sing chorus, — that he was born chorus-y, lives chorus-y, and will die chorus-y.” This impudence is rather the more delightful for being an interpolation.

The only time we hear dear “Mr. Pickwick’s” voice is on this occasion. He says very little, merely putting a few leading questions that keep conversation afloat, yet we recognize our old benefactor at once in the countenance that “glows with an expression of universal philanthropy,” and in a blandness of speech that cannot belong to any one else. Several young gentlemen who attended the original party are not present at its repetition, “Mr. Gunter,” among others, being absent. His share in the quarrel with “Mr. Noddy” is necessarily transferred to “Jack Hopkins,” and the quarrel is really so enlivening that you long to have it become general; but at the most promising moment, “Mr. Noddy” “allows his feelings to overpower him,” and “Mr. Hopkins” prefers “Mr. Noddy” “to his own mother,” whereupon the combatants shake hands with so much effusion that your blood-thirsty aspirations are strangled.

“Jack Hopkins” is what “Bob Sawyer” would have been, had not “Mrs. Raddle’s” “malevolence” thrown cold water upon his ardent spirits. He is the ideal of all the medical students that ever had a talent for lying combined with a tendency to black velvet waistcoats, thunder-and-lightning buttons, blue striped shirts, and false white collars. The general inflation of “Jack Hopkins’s” “person; the professional cast of countenance; the voice which makes its escape as best it can between closed teeth, and from a mouth apparently full of mush; the hands that are thrust into pantaloon-pockets, as if to be carefully preserved for the next surgical operation, — an attitude that, when accompanied by an oscillation of the body, as in “Jack Hopkins’s” case, always indicates superior wisdom, — are sui generis. He represents a type in caricature. All “Jack’s” medical stories are good, but all are obscured by the boy that swallowed a necklace. Even “Betsy” is obliged to divide the honors with this infant phenomenon. It may be doing Mr. Dickens great injustice, but it really seems as if he were as funny as he can be in this absurdest of burlesques. The law of self-preservation should prevent him from being any funnier, for, if he has no regard for his own feelings, he should consider those of others, and remember that people have been tickled to death. “Peggotty” would burst every button, hook-and-eye that ever approached her jovial person. Mr. Dickens makes the story; the story does not make him. The inflexions of his voice are in themselves mirth-provoking, the mere pronunciation of the word “necklace” inspiring as much laughter as is usually accorded to a low comedy man’s best “point.” In one short sentence he rushes up and down the gamut most originally. Words can give no idea of the effect produced; perhaps a wretched outline drawing may. For example: — toys,

“Child

being fond of lace,

cribbed

neck hid lace,

neck lace,

neck

of cut string bead!”

and

swallowed

Those who have heard Mr. Dickens, will understand this illustration, and may perhaps thank me for it. Those who have not heard him, will not understand it, and will not thank me. When, after hearing a noise “like a small hail-storm,” the father exclaims, — boy!”

“Don’t my do that,

and the child replies, —

“I aint a doin’ nothing “ — whereupon the father rejoins, — gain!”

a

“Well,

do it

— fun appears to have reached its perihelion, but when, after shaking the boy, the father cries out, —

"Why,
God bless my soul,
in its the child!
 in the place!"
got the croup
He's wrong

— nothing is left for human nature but to laugh at every pore. If the public eye were not upon you, you would abandon yourself to an ecstasy of delight. Dreading that public eye, you swallow, not a necklace, but a pocket-handkerchief, and rather fear spontaneous combustion. Indeed, this story puts you in such good-humor that you are quite ready to shake hands with your worst enemy, quite ready to withdraw your former desire that he might write a book, and you go home from “Bob Sawyer’s Party,” wishing that all parties were equally select and equally entertaining.

There have been many trials for breach of promise of marriage, but none ever shook the world to its centre as that of “Bardell versus Pickwick” has shaken it. Building his reputation on a Pickwickian foundation, the cornerstone of which is this same renowned Trial, it was meet that Mr. Dickens should again bring this interesting case into court to be sat upon by an impartial jury of a New World.

Mr. Dickens's manner of conducting the Trial is irreproachable, saving in one respect. In other Readings he has displayed great art and sagacity in the selections made from his novels, and in the trimming down of these selections; but in depriving The Trial of its fair proportions he subjects us to the “most unkindest cut of all.” Assuredly the reader should be the best judge of what is, and what is not suited to his purpose, and yet there seems to be no good reason for the wholesale employment of a pruning-knife in this particular instance. What Mr. Dickens suppresses would not materially add to the length of the Reading, while the amount of effect lost is very considerable. Mr. Dickens is guilty of unjustifiable homicide. How he can wilfully cut the throat of “Thomas Groffin,” the chemist, thereby preventing him from being sworn in as a juror and indulging in an edifying conversation with “Mr. Justice Stareleigh,” passeth all understanding. Robbing “Sergeant Buzfuz” of one of the greatest points in his address to the jury, is even more extraordinary. “Let me tell him “ (Pickwick), “gentlemen, that any gestures of dissent or disapprobation in which he may indulge in this court will not go down with you; that you will know how to value and how to appreciate them; and let me tell him further, as my lord will tell you, gentlemen, that a counsel, in the discharge of his duty to his client, is neither to be intimidated nor bullied, nor put down; and that any attempt to do either the one or the other, or the first or the last, will recoil on the head of the attempted, be he plaintiff or be he defendant, be his name Pickwick, or Noakes, or Stoakes, or Stiles, or Brown, or Thompson!” That Mr. Dickens should ignore this sentence, which may be called the heart of the address, and is full of just such effects as he best knows how to produce, appears almost incredible. Less strange is the suppression of “Mr. Winkle’s” cross-examination by “Mr. Phunkey” and “Sergeant Buzfuz,” although no one who has seen Mr. Dickens in his great character of “Winkle” will ever cease to sigh over its omission. The most unpardonable sin of all, however, is Mr. Dickens’s inhuman treatment of “Sam Weller.” He actually prevents “Sam” from making two of his best speeches. Said “Sam,” “I had a reg’lar fit out o’ clothes that mornin,’ gen’l’men of the jury, and that was a wery particler and uncommon circumstance with me in those days.” “The little judge, looking with an angry countenance over his desk, said, ‘You had better be careful, sir.’”

““ So Mr. Pickwick said at the time, my Lord,’ replied Sam, ‘and I was wery careful o’ that ‘ere suit o’ clothes; wery careful indeed, my lord.’” Astounding though it be, the little judge does not give “Sam” his cue, “You had better be careful;” consequently “Sam” cannot make the retort courteous. And what is worse, — so bad that if there were a degree beyond the superlative it should be expressed by it, — “Sam’s “ final interrogatory remark to the Court, "Would any other gen'l'man like to ask me anythin'?" is treated with as much silent contempt as if it had never been made. The friends of "Sam Weller" should protest as one man against this indignity, and demand satisfaction of Mr. Dickens. Is this indignity to be taken "in a common sense?" or is it to be regarded from "a Pickwickian point of view?"

It may be ungrateful to look a gift-horse in the mouth; but when that horse has a beautiful mane and tail which are unnecessarily curtailed by too much "Englishing," should we not demur, particularly when that horse is Mr. Dickens's cheval de bataille?

Inner consciousness will accomplish miracles. It once evolved a camel; and I thought, not long ago, that it had evolved this famous "Pickwick Trial," so completely as to contest the honors with reality. I was mistaken, and now confess that I never knew how great the Trial was until Mr. Dickens made a panorama of himself, turned a crank, and unwound the entire scene. The eight characters that figure in the court-room are matchlessly delineated, while the assumption of the court itself is truly wonderful. When Mr. Dickens appears as "the little judge," the theory of metempsychosis seems to be practically carried out. Mr. Dickens steps out of his own skin which, for the time being, is occupied by "Justice Stareleigh." His little round eyes, wide-open and blinking; his elevated eyebrows that are in a constant state of interrogation; his mouth, drawn down by the weight of the law; the expression of the ensemble which clearly denotes that everybody is a rascal whether found guilty or not; and the stern, ironclad voice, apparently measuring out justice in as small quantities as possible, and never going faster than a dead march, — make up an impersonation that is extraordinary, even for Mr. Dickens.

Court. "Who is with you, brother Buzfliz? . . . Anybody with you, brother Snubbin?"

"Mr. Phunky, my lord."

Court. "Go on." This "go on" seals "Justice Stareleigh's" fate. The door of the court seems to shut with a gruff click, and the satire is complete.

Though a less original creation, "Sergeant Buzfuz" is truly admirable. He whispers to "Dodson," confers briefly with "Fogg," settles his wig, and proceeds to address the jury. The rising inflexion — which, if not natural to Mr. Dickens, has been adopted by him to overcome the defects of an imperfect voice — here produces most comical effects. “Never, from the very first moment of his applying himself to the study and practice

The intonation and action accompanying the repetition of these final words, are delightfully burlesque. “Sergeant Buzfuz” draws back his head and then throws it forward to add impressiveness to speech, while a muscular contortion going on at the back of his neck and rippling down his shoulders, suggests memories of a heavy swell on the ocean. Truth and justice are evidently convulsed.

The “sergeant” thrills his auditors by suiting the action to the word, and bringing down his hand with a mighty bang on the “box” in which “the unimpeachable female,” “Mrs. Bardell,” is to be placed.

He is no less affecting when, speaking of his client as a widow, “yes, gentlemen, a widow,” he produces a pocket-handkerchief for appropriate application, and refers to the late Mr. Bardell’s having “glided almost imperceptibly from the world, to seek elsewhere for that repose and peace which a custom-house

In such oratory as might move the most obdurate to tears. (I do not specify what kind of tears.)

A single gentleman is no sooner invited to inquire within, than a juror with an anxious countenance, expressive of a profound sense of responsibility, starts up, and inquires without, “There is no date to that, is there, sir?” If I were a court, I should always insist upon having that conscientious man impanelled.

and aims the forefinger of his right hand at the defendant’s head, it becomes a query whether grotesque action is not as difficult to excel in as absolute grace. Mr. Dickens has learned its secret.

are received with all the approbation they so richly deserve. When “Sergeant Buzfuz” appeals for damages “to an enlightened, a high-minded, aright-feeling, a conscientious, a dispassionate, a sympathizing, a contemplative, and I may say a highly poetic jury of her civilized countrymen,” his peroration takes instant effect, and he retires behind a round of applause.

“Mrs. Cluppins” is no sooner called than she appears, and in voice and physiognomy does ample justice to “Mrs. Bardell’s bosom-friend, number one.” She assures my lord and jury that she will not deceive them, whereupon the little judge almost entirely covers himself with glory, by slowly shaking his profound head at her and saying, —

“You had better not, ma’am.” The little of the little judge left unadorned, by the before-mentioned enviable article of apparel, is quickly covered, upon “Mrs. Cluppins” remarking that she “see Mrs. Bardell’s street door on the jar.”

“On the what?” asks the judge in a state of owl-like astonishment.

“Partly open, my lord, partly open.”

“She said on the jar” and the little judge is at this moment a parody on all the legal stupidity that ever ornamented England’s bar.

“Nathaniel Winkle,” cries “Mr. Skimpin.” —

“He-ah, he-ah,” replies an embarrassed voice, and we meet our old friend of the green shooting-coat, plaid neckerchief and closely-fitted drabs, face to face. This easily discomposed gentleman is surely he who was so brave at duelling; who attempted to mount his horse on the wrong side, and when he got off the animal's back could not possibly get up again; who fired at rooks and brought down the left arm of his friend, "Mr. Tupman." By the professional way in which "Mr. Skimpin" badgers our sporting friend and rolls the badgering as a sweet morsel under his tongue, — the expression of his countenance denoting positive delight in the work before him, — one might believe that Mr. Dickens had passed the greater part of his life in trying the law, or being tried by it. The scene wherein the little judge browbeats "Winkle" on the subject of the latter's name, ought to be handed down to posterity; but alas! it never can be and this is the worst of acting.

Court. "Have — you — any — Christian — name, sir?" "Nathaniel, sir?"

Court. "Dan-iel. Have — you — any — other — name?"

"Nathaniel, sir, — my lord, I mean."

Court. "Na-thaniel Dan-iel, — or Daniel Nathaniel?"

"No, my lord, only Nathaniel; not Daniel at all, my lord. Nathaniel."

Court. "What — did — you — tell — me

— it — was — Daniel, for, then, sir?"

"I didn't, my lord."

Court. "You — did — sir. How — could — I — possibly — have — got — Daniel — on — my — notes — unless — you — told me so, sir?"

The contrast between the flustered stammering of poor "Winkle," and the impenetrable infallibility of "Justice Stareleigh," delivered in a slow, authoritative tone, as if founded on the Rock of Ages, is remarkable. Then "Mr. Skimpin" resumes his pleasant pastime, — which may be likened to a mental bull-fight, "Mr. Skimpin" being the triumphant bull engaged in goring "Winkle," the inexperienced matador.

"O, you don't know the plaintiff, but you have seen her? Now will you please to tell the gentlemen of the jury what you mean by that, Mr. Winkle?"

After hearing Mr. Winkle's reply to this aggravating question, it is possible to believe that "even a worm will turn." Our sporting friend, as we all know, is not very combative, but wherever his combativeness may be situated, the goring has at last reached it. "Mr. Winkle" does not assault "Mr. Skimpin," — for under greater provocation it would be contrary to our friend's constitution to assault anybody, — but he does all that doth become a "Winkle." He squirms in the witness-box; he grows so red in the face as to render his plaid neckerchief pale by comparison, and is only saved from strangulation by finding vent for his feelings in the words, "God bless my soul! I mean that I am not intimate with her, but that I have seen her when I went to call on Mr. Pickwick in Goswell street."

At this crisis "Mr. Winkle" is immensely satisfactory to his friends, yet he is almost as delightful when he endeavors to gulp down the confession that he did see "Mrs. Bardell" in "Mr. Pickwick's" arms, and did hear him ask "the good creature to compose herself." "Mr. Winkle's" attempt to swallow several of the most implicative words, which attempt is finally overwhelmed by a stern devotion to truth that draws out the facts with a species of mental corkscrew, leaves nothing more to be desired.

At the close of this incomparable examination, Susannah Saunders, "bosom friend number two," performs her small part with credit to herself and "Mr. Saunders," after which "Sergeant Buzfuz" rises to the occasion and cries out, "Call Samuel Weller!"

If conclusions may be drawn from the applause that greets this announcement, there never was so universal a favorite as "Samuel Weller." Everybody looks intensely pleased and everybody settles himself as if saying, "Now I shall enjoy myself more than I ever did in my life." Is it strange that many are disappointed? Almost everybody has a pet theory with regard to "Sam Weller," and no two of these innumerable theories agree. Surely then it is not astonishing that Mr. Dickens's interpretation of this character fails to satisfy unreasonable expectations. People look upon "Sam" as neither fish, flesh, nor fowl; as some lusus naturae to be impossibly portrayed. Mr. Dickens's "Sam Weller" is a human being, very like other human beings belonging to the same profession, and his resemblance in voice and expression to an English coachman of my acquaintance is so striking that the two might readily pass for brothers. "Sam" has comparatively little to do in court, yet he is expected to crowd his entire life into a few sentences, that, from the very nature of the case, must be delivered quietly and with sly rather than boisterous humor. "Sam" never is boisterous, however. If there ever was a cool, self-possessed individual with a supreme contempt for people who, like "Weller Senior," are given to explosions of mirth, it is "Sam." It does not necessarily follow because Mr. Dickens has created "Sam," that he is therefore most competent to delineate him. Shakespeare never soared higher than "The Ghost" in "Hamlet," and the impression left upon posterity is that he was a better manager than actor. Lee read his dramatic works like an angel; but when he strode the stage, the angel became a walking-stick. Sheridan Knowles was a shocking bad actor. But Mr. Dickens is so saturated with dramatic ideas, and embodies these ideas so well, that it is safe to declare him a better judge of "Sam's" nature than any one else. If Americans were Englishmen they would see the truthfulness of this portraiture. But nothing in the world can save "Sam" from being entirely eclipsed by "Justice Stareleigh."

"Little to do and plenty to get, I suppose," exclaims "Sergeant Buzfuz," referring to "Sam's" situation with "Mr. Pickwick."

"Oh, quite enough to get, sir, as the soldier said ven they ordered him three hundred and fifty lashes."

Court. "You-must-not-tell-us-what-the-sol-dier-said. The-evi-dence-of-that-sol-dier-can-not-be - received - unless - that-soldier-is-in court,-and-is-ex-am-ined-in-the-usual-way."

The little judge covers himself with a second coat of glory, and the text furnishes "Sam" with no opportunity to establish his superiority over the most stupid and learned bigwig. As intimated once before, Sam's best chance of being as slyly funny as he can be, is in the expurgated question, "Would any other gen'l'man like to ask me anythin'?" By restoring it, and by illustrating how "Sam" retires from the witness-box, Mr. Dickens might add another green leaf to his laurels.

No one is disappointed in "Tony Weller," because "Tony Weller's" most remarkable characteristics are his "hoarse voice, like some strange effort of ventriloquism," "the extreme tip of a very rubicund nose," "an underdone roast-beef complexion," and an unbounded stomach. Consequently, "Tony Weller" has but to open his mouth to stand before us in his full proportions; that is, when Mr. Dickens assumes the role. His exclamation, "Quite right too, Samivel, quite right. Put it down a we, my Lord, put it down a we!" takes the audience by storm, the author's identification with the character being complete. He not only talks like "Tony," but, expanding under the influence of beer and countless wrappers, he suggests the immortal stage-driver's personnel; and when the trial is over, and "Tony Weller" moralizes over it, saying, "I know'd what 'ud come o' this here way o' doin' bisniss. . O Samivel, Samivel, vy warn't there a alley bi!" it seems hardly possible that the slight, energetic man, who, a moment later, walks briskly oft' the stage, can have produced so perfect an illusion.

Let us leave Mr. Dickens “in one of those moments of unmixed happiness, of which, if we seek them, there are ever some to cheer our transitory existence here. There are dark shadows on the earth, but its lights are stronger in the contrast. Some men, like bats or owls, have better eyes for the darkness than for the light; we, who have no such optical powers, are better pleased to take our last parting look at the visionary companions of many solitary hours, when the brief ‘gaslight of the Reading-Room’ is blazing full Upon them.”

Thus Mr. Dickens takes leave of” Mr. Pickwick,” and thus, with some verbal liberties, we take leave of Mr. Dickens.

EXEUNT OMNES

The Readings are over, the curtain falls, and Mr. Dickens passes from among us, — probably forever. What is the final verdict? That Mr. Dickens is one of the best of actors, and, as an interpreter of himself, stands unrivalled. The debt we owe Mr. Dickens the author is increased twofold by his visit to this country, for he has demonstrated by personal illustration the meaning of the long-neglected art of reading. He has shown us that it means a perfectly easy, unaffected manner, a thoroughly colloquial tone, and an entire absence of the stilted elocution that has heretofore passed current for good reading, the virus of which has well-nigh ruined our school of public speaking. Mr. Dickens has done more: he has proved that the very best reading is such as approaches the very best acting, and in adopting the actor’s profession he has paid the highest tribute to a noble art, — one to which he has always been an earnest and devoted friend. Charles Dickens is now twice Charles Dickens. He is author, and actor, as only Shakespeare has been before him; and the balance between the two may be considered almost even, for while Shakespeare is of course the greater author, it is safe to regard Charles Dickens as the finer actor! Herein the latter resembles the magician who pours out numberless wines and liqueurs from one small black bottle. He “costumes his mind,” as Carlyle once declared, and without change of scene presents a repertoire of eighty characters! This is but a small percentage of his Fancy’s children, — the dramatis persona) of his fourteen principal works numbering no less than seven hundred and ninety-two, — yet it is enough. Nevertheless, were I omnipotent, I would have Mr. Dickens luxuriously incarcerated until he had made a dramatic study of every one of his books, and was prepared to read them by instalments. Perhaps in another world, where time is of no consequence, Mr. Dickens may give his mind to a like occupation. With such audiences as he can there draw around him, it will indeed be “a feast of reason and a flow of soul.”

And Charles Dickens has accomplished other good-. Twelve years ago he wrote of the American nation: “I know full well, whatever little motes my beamy eyes may have descried in theirs, that they are a kind, large-hearted, generous, and great people.” In that faith he came to see us, in that faith he is now more fully confirmed than ever. His reception proves that our personal interest in him is akin to personal affection, and with Landor of old are we of to-day ready to exclaim, —

”Here comes the minister!
Yes, thou art he, although not sent
By cabinet or parliament:
Yes, thou art he.”

Charles Dickens is a minister of peace and light, and the prophecy that he would “lay down a third cable of intercommunication and alliance between the Old World and the New” is fast being fulfilled. In him, author and actor, the New World bids the Old World welcome, and thus “putting a girdle round the earth, “we say, as the new “minister” has often said, “God bless us every one.”

PORTRAITS AND MEMOIRS

From Harper's New Monthly Magazine, February 1871, p.413-417

By R.H. Horne

The Duke of Devonshire. — Sir Joseph Paxton. — Charles Dickens. — Mark Lemon. — Augustus Egg, It. A. — Robert Bell. — Douglas Jerrold, etc

THERE are certain events and seasons when the overanxiety of the mind to write worthily concerning them almost puts what is understood by literary men as “good writing” out of the question. At such times men can not write as they think, or wish to think; they can only record, with more or less coherence, what they feel and remember. And this record, these memories, are often liable to be somewhat confused by the mist which is occasioned by inward tears, the mourning heart, the bewildered brain, the thoughts that “puzzle the will,” and cause us to be dubious of our course, as of the realities of life. We read of certain men’s deaths as so many “words” which do not represent any such actual facts; and when we seek to meet and measure and cope with the truth it makes us vaguely speculate upon the uncertainties of all the moving lives around us, as though they were so many representations of the “dance of death,” in which we ourselves would shortly have to join.

And the latter thought may well glance through the brain, and return to renew the look of destiny with a more fixed regard, when it breaks upon the mind of one of the very few survivors of such a group as that of the once brilliant “Guild of Literature and Art” in London.

This Guild, which commenced with the highest prospects of success, was founded (though the idea had been originated years before by the writer of this paper) by Charles Dickens and Lord Lytton. The latter, at that time Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, proposed to give land upon one of his estates, in a locality suitable for the erection of a college, and to write a comedy, to be acted, with a view to raise a preliminary fund in aid of the object in question; and, in the first instances, the performers were to be celebrated authors and artists. All this was undertaken by Mr. Charles Dickens and the following — shall we say melancholy, list? It would be painful to put the record in a gloomy light. Neither would this be wise or necessary. Let us rather suppose the figures, to gleam forth upon the richly painted windows of some beautiful old cathedral, with the organ softly and deeply breathing noble strains, as if from distant clouds, while the spectator beholds the bright images of those who will never more appear upon this earthly scene.

The artists who were engaged on Lord Lytton's comedy of "Not so Bad as we Seem; or, Many Sides to a Character," were Daniel Maclise, R. A., Clarkson Stanfield, R. A., John Leech, Augustus Egg, R. A., Mr. Topham, Mr. Frank Stone, and Mr. Tenniel. The authors were Charles Dickens, Mark Lemon, Dudley Costello, Robert Bell, Douglas Jerrold (all gone!), and Mr. John Forster, Mr. Charles Knight, and the writer of the present brief chronicle. (Mr. Wilkie Collins and two or three others were engaged in subsequent performances; but the above list comprises, I think, all those who appeared in the first instance, when the play was represented at Devonshire House.) The stage architect and machinist was Sir Joseph Paxton; and to his name among the "past and gone" we have to add that of our most kind and munificent patron, the late Duke of Devonshire. It will hence appear that the only survivors of those who inaugurated the "Guild" are Lord Lytton and the three authors previously indicated.

The Duke gave us the use of his large picture-gallery, to be fitted up with seats for the audience, and his library, adjoining, for the erection of the theatre. The latter room being larger than required for the stage and its scenery, the back portion of it was screened off for a "green-room." Sir Joseph Paxton was most assiduous and careful in the erection of the theatre and seats. There was a special box for the Queen. None of the valuable paintings in the picture-gallery (arranged for the auditorium) were removed, but all of them were faced with planks, and covered with crimson velvet draperies. In the erection of the theatre not a nail was allowed to be hammered into the floor or the walls, the lateral supports being by the pressure from end to end of padded beams, and the uprights or stanchions were fitted with iron feet, firmly fixed to the floor by copper screws. The lamps and their oil were well considered, so that the smoke should not be offensive or injurious — in fact, I think the oil was slightly scented — and there was a profusion of wax-candles. Sir Joseph Paxton also arranged all the ventilation in the most skillful manner; and, with some assistance from a theatrical machinist, he put up all the scenery, curtains, and flies. Mr. Dickens was unanimously dubbed general manager, and Mr. Mark Lemon stage-manager. We had a professional gentleman for prompter, as none of the amateurs could be intrusted with so technical, tactical, ticklish, and momentous a series of duties.

Never in the world of theatres was a better manager than Charles Dickens. Without, of course, questioning the superiority of Goethe (in the Weimar theatre) as a manager in all matters of high-class dramatic literature, one can not think he could have been so excellent in all general requirements, stage effects, and practical details of acting, and of theatrical business. Equally assiduous and unwearying as Dickens surely very few men ever were, or could possibly be. He appeared almost ubiquitous and sleepless. We had many (I really think thirteen) rehearsals, six or seven of them after every body knew his part letter-perfect.

Nothing could surpass the princely munificence of the Duke of Devonshire throughout this occasion, unless, indeed, it were his extreme kindness and delicate consideration for the feelings of all the authors and artists engaged in the matter. The gates of Devonshire House were thrown open to our dingy hackneys and cabriolets, with all the ceremony of porters and footmen, precisely as though our vehicles had been the usual classes of courtly equipage. A profuse and elegant cold collation, comprising every delicacy in and out of season, and the choicest wines, was always served for the “company,” behind whose carved chairs the Duke’s own footmen, in full livery (“uniform” would seem to be a more literal term, as they all wore double silver-bullion epaulets); and at most of these twelve or thirteen luxurious luncheons, or dejeuners a la fourchettes, his Grace sat down with us, apologizing for the state of his health, which limited him to a very spare indulgence. Some of these scenes would not have been out of place in “Lothair,” had the author witnessed them.

The principal scenes were painted by Clarkson Stanfield, but some of them, I think, were the work of Maclise; indeed it appeared that Mr. Egg, as well as Topham and Tenniel, gave frequent assistance, as they were all continually on the stage during the touching up and arrangement of the scenery. Mr. Planche was consulted about the costumes, and it was agreed that the wigs and “make-up” of faces should be as good and characteristic as possible. One military “character,” not considering himself sufficiently tall for the part, had a pair of thigh-boots made with cork heels four inches high.

Several amusing incidents occurred in the course of the rehearsals. The first (one can only speak of what one knows) was during the preparation of the scenic arrangements, some alteration in which was required. Sir Joseph Paxton gave his directions, and went away for a time. The hour for rehearsal had not yet come, and we were conning our parts in the green-room. Meanwhile a tall, elderly gentleman, very plainly dressed in a suit of what looked like rather rusty black, had got upon the stage, and was lurking among the wings — now in one place, now in another — with an amiable smile upon his countenance, denoting the interest he took in the proceedings. The heavy roller of a scene was now being hoisted, and the tall gentleman in rusty black became confused as to his whereabouts. “Now, Sir,” exclaimed a voice, “do, for Heaven’s sake, keep out of the way! Do you want to get your back broke?” The elderly gentleman apologized with a deprecating bow, and immediately retired. “Who was that?” somebody inquired, but nobody on the stage at that moment knew. It was the Duke. This direful contre-temps was speedily put to rights by the ready tact and proper feeling of our manager, and was the source of much amusement to the amiable nobleman, who warmly and humorously expressed his thanks for the timely warning. It was “set about” that the blunder had been committed by one of the stage-carpenters, but there was good reason to be afraid that it was one of nous autres.

Another incident, which will be regarded as rather odd and unique, may serve as material for some curious speculation as to the force of imagination, and also of the sympathy between our visual and olfactory organs. “Colonel Flint,” of the Guards, a bully and duelist, described in the dramatis personae “a fire-eater,” was to stand with his back to the red glowing chimney-piece in Will’s Coffee-house. The period is that of George the First, when it was fashionable for the great bloods and bucks of the day to smoke long pipes, designated as “a yard of clay.” With such a pipe Colonel Flint had duly provided himself for rehearsal; and, to make his stage business more perfect, soft-rolling clouds of smoke began to issue from the bowl, and float over the once famous coffee-room. In no time came the manager, speaking quickly: “My dear Home, on no account attempt to smoke! The Queen detests tobacco, and would leave the box immediately!”

“But there’s no tobacco, in the pipe,” replied the Colonel.

“Oh! come — nonsense!”

“Look here!” and the Colonel took out of his waistcoat pocket a handful of dried herbs. “I got these in Covent Garden Market this morning on the way to rehearsal.”

“Well, we smelled tobacco the moment we came within sight of the stage,” said Mr. Dickens. “The pipe must be foul.”

“It is a brand-new pipe!”

Mark Lemon now came up, and protesting that he also had smelled tobacco, and that the pipe must have been an old one reburned to look clean, the offending clay was flung aside.

Before the next rehearsal, however, another pipe, warranted new and pure, was obtained, independent of which it was placed in the fire, and kept there at red-heat long enough to purify it ten times over, even had it been one of the unclean. Again the cloud began to unfold its volume over Will’s Coffee-room; and this time Sir Joseph Paxton came running from the seat in the front, upon the stage, declaring that the Queen so detested the smell of tobacco that smoking must really not be attempted. Once again the Colonel protested the innocence of his pipe, in proof of which he produced a handful of dried thyme and rosemary from his waistcoat pocket. In vain. Sir Joseph insisted that he had smelled tobacco! They all smelled it! So this second yard of clay was sent to shivers.

But the Colonel had chanced to see a “Model of the Battle of Waterloo,” exhibited some years before, in Leicester Square, in which the various miniature platoons of infantry, as well as the brigades of artillery, were supposed to be firing volleys, the clouds and wreaths of smoke being fragile fixtures. These capital imitations of clouds and wreaths of smoke were discovered, on very close examination, to be composed of extremely fine and thinly drawn-out webs of cotton, supported on rings and long twirls of almost invisible wire, and attached at one end to the mouths and muzzles of the miniature cannon and musketry. This model for a triumph in the art of smoking a pipe in the presence of a Queen who abhorred tobacco was now adopted by Colonel Flint, but held in reserve for the morning of the rehearsal for the full-dress rehearsal of the same night, when there would be a preliminary audience. He ventured to flatter himself that all these delicate considerations and assiduities would be much applauded and complimented both by the author and the management. Far from it. No sooner was the cloud of apparent smoke perceived to issue from the pipe than the manager, the stage-manager, and Sir Joseph Paxton hurried together to the too assiduous Guardsman, begging him on no account to persist in this smoking! — this smoke, or (on examining the smoke) this appearance of smoking. It would be most injudicious. Her Majesty would think she smelled tobacco, and that would be as bad as if her Majesty really smelled it. At the same time they added, collectively, that they themselves had smelled tobacco, no matter from what source or what cause. Of course there was an end of the matter, as we were all anxious to be harmonious; and the discomfited “fire-eater” of the comedy did the best he could to bully the company in Will’s Coffee-room with his empty-bowled and immaculate yard of clay. These minute details, however, will serve to show the pains that were taken even with the slightest parts of this performance — pains that were worthy of this come’die Francaise. But with regard to the supposed tobacco-smoke, “there’s more in that than meets the eye.” For, query — did they not really get a faint whiff of tobacco, though no such thing had been there? By the force of imagination, it will, of course, be said. Yes; but not only by that, but by some subtile power of memory and association reproducing such an effect upon the senses. It is easy to smile; but who knows? With which adventurous but very pregnant problem we will leave the subject.

At the full-dress rehearsal the audience was composed exclusively of the relatives, friends, and acquaintances of the Duke of Devonshire, and of the authors and artists engaged in the performance. All went well, and the “first night” was announced. The tickets were five guineas each, and her Majesty sent a hundred guineas for her box. This night also — our all-important night — went off most satisfactorily. Only one little accident occurred. Every gentleman of the period, of any rank, wore a sword; the manager, therefore, intimated that as our stage was small, and would be nearly filled up with side tables and tables in front in the conspiracy scene in Will’s Coffee-house, it would be prudent and important that the swords of the dramatis personae should be most carefully considered in passing down the centre and round one of the tables in front. At this table sat the “Duke of Middlesex” (Mr. Frank Stone) and the “Earl of Loftus” (Mr. Dudley Costello) in a private and high-treasonous conversation. On the table were decanter, glasses, plates of fruit, etc. At the other table in front sat "Mr. David Fallen" (Mr. Augustus Egg), the half-starved Grub Street author and political pamphleteer, with some bread and cheese and a little mug of ale. The eventful moment came when "Mr. Shadowly Softhead" (Douglas Jerrold), Colonel Flint, and others, had to pass down the narrow space in the middle of the stage, to be presented to the "Duke of Middlesex;" and then, as there was not room enough to enable them to turn about and retire up the stage, they were to pass round the corner of that table, and make their exit at the right first entrance. This was done by all with safety and a reasonably good grace except one gentleman, who shall not be named; for as he rose from his courtly bowing advance, and passed round, the tip of his jutting-out sword went closely across the surface of the table and swept off the whole of the "properties" and realities. Decanter, glasses, plates, a pineapple, a painted pound cake, and several fine wooden peaches, rolled pell-mell upon the stage, and, as usual, made for the foot-lights. A considerable "sensation" passed over the courtly audience, amidst which the Queen (to judge by the shaking of the handkerchief in front of the royal face) by no means remained unmoved. But Mr. Dickens, who, as "Lord Wilmot," happened to be close in front, with admirable promptitude and tact, instantly called, with a jaunty air of command, "Here, drawer, come and clear away this wreck!" as though the disaster had been a part of the business of the scene, while the others on the stage so well managed their by-play that many of the audience were in some doubt about the accident. When inquiry was instituted as to the culprit on this occasion, who had failed to carry his sword with due circumspection, as every one of the "Guild" protested his innocence of the awkward fact in question, it was presently discovered that the guilty individual was a supernumerary lord for that scene enacted by a gentleman who was one of the Duke's suit.

Two other amusing incidents occurred. A number of bedrooms had been placed at our disposal for dressing-rooms. A certain gentleman of the "company," who was disposed to be rather portly, had been somewhat too long over the buttoning of a long-flapped and stiffly embroidered waistcoat, and the call-boy had been sent up stairs a second time from the prompter below to inform him that the stage would immediately be "waiting" for him. Away ran the boy, and vanished round a corner. In his haste the "character" in question took a wrong turn, and coming upon a steep flight of stairs, down he hurried, and thence down another long flight, and presently found that he was close upon the kitchens. Up he rushed again, and scuttled along the gallery till he turned into a still longer gallery, well lighted, but vacant, and hopeless. Once more he made a turn, now wild with the thought of the stage being kept waiting, and seeing a tall, dark figure passing the further end, he rushed toward it — wigged, powdered, buckled, ruffled, perspiring, maddened, and gasping out, “Where, where’s the stage?” He was barely able to recognize that his preserver was the Duke, who, with a most delighted and delightful urbanity, at once put him upon his right course. Another miscalculation of time occurred in consequence of Sir Joseph Paxton remarking in the green-room, just after the conclusion of the performance, that he had arranged the Queen’s chair in the supper-room in a peculiar manner, with exotic and other rare flowers which had arrived that evening fresh from the Duke’s gardens at Chatsworth. Colonel Flint, hearing this, requested permission to see the floral throne before her Majesty’s entrance to the supper-room. “By all means,” said Sir Joseph, “but you must be very quick.” Away hurried the applicant, and was speedily in the supper-room, and made his way, his stage-costume notwithstanding, through a number of gentlemen-in-waiting, officers attired in a very different sort of uniform, footmen, etc., to their no small surprise and amusement.

At the top of the table, and furthest from the door, there was a richly-carved and cushioned chair, raised a few inches above all the other chairs. It had large padded arms of figured satin and velvet, and a high back that had a curved Gothic arch at the top. But very little of the chair could be clearly seen, and its outline was only indicated here and there. The whole of the back was devoted to a perfect cascade of roses, red and white, chiefly for their odor, mingled with magnolias, jasmine, honeysuckle, and tuberose; but the high arch and sides of the chair were overhung with festoons and long, dripping falls and tangles of the most lovely orchidaceous and other exotic plants, and by fine trickling tendrils and dangling lines, bearing little starry flowers, and very minute and curiously shaped leaves, leaflets, and tiny fairy buds, and some of the creepers displaying little flowers and leaves that resembled a sort of floral jewelry. At the top of the arched chair-back there was a large night-flowering cereus of most delicious and recondite perfume. (No wonder Sir Joseph was so much alarmed at tobacco!) The predominating colors were snow-white and apple-green, with a little soft azure, and a few scarlet buds, and here and there a dark Tuscan rose or two, for shadows — the whole having been carefully selected and arranged by Sir Joseph as a suitable back-ground for the dress worn by her Majesty on this, we may fairly say, unprecedented occasion. An imitation of dew-drops was achieved to a degree of perfect illusion, by means of opals and glass, as it seemed — a piece of refined ingenuity which was about to undergo a closer inspection by Flint, when suddenly it was announced that the Queen was approaching the supper-room! Instantly the oblivious Colonel made a dash for the open door, but it was only to encounter the bowing backs and elegant coat-tails of gentlemen and lords in waiting, who were ushering in her Majesty. There was nothing for it but to spring aside, and range in line with the officers and gentlemen in attendance, and to “stand attention,” as if on grand parade. He trusted, in the confusion of the moment, that his Guardsman’s uniform of the time of George I., notwithstanding the polished thigh-boots and towering powdered wig, would not be observed by the Queen, with Prince Albert, the Duke, and suit attending her. Vain hope. However, with long, rapid strides, the instant her Majesty had passed, the anachronistic uniform made its exit at the rear of the line in which it had so unseasonably appeared en militaire.

Various other incidents, no doubt, transpired with respect to different individuals, but did not chance to come under the present writer’s observation.

After the performance, and before leaving the box, her Majesty had sent to the manager to express her gratification, coupled with the remark: “They act very well indeed.” This was duly announced to the company when assembled for supper, and received with great satisfaction, modest and otherwise; but Dickens went on, dryly adding: “But the Queen is very kind, and was sure to say that,” which very much straightened the complacent faces round the table, till they all laughed at each other. Nevertheless, a few more words may be said on the subject. They really did act well; some very well. When it is remembered the studious sort of men they all were, and the time, together with the great pains, bestowed in all respects, why not? The principal character, as matter of elocution, was that of “Hardman,” and the gentleman personating this rising young statesman was unquestionably one of the best private readers of the day. Then, as to acting, most of the company were practiced amateurs long before this event, more especially Douglas Jerrold and Mark Lemon, who, in parts that suited them, were first-rate actors, almost equal to Dickens. The latter two were matchless in the after-piece, but the parts they played in the comedy were not in accordance with their peculiar talents. It has been said that Mr. Dickens, in private life, had very much the appearance of a sea-faring man. This is quite true; and his long daily walks about London and the environs, or at the sea-side, caused him to have a very sun-burnt, weather-beaten face. His full-length portrait might readily be mistaken for the captain of an East Indiaman, if truthfully painted. But the character and costume of "Lord Wilmot, a young man at the head of the mode more than a century ago," did not suit him, and was, in fact, against the grain of his nature. His bearing on the stage and the tone of his voice were too rigid, loud, and quarter-deck-like for such "rank and fashion;" and his make-up, with the three-cornered gold-laced cocked hat, black curled wig, huge sleeve-cuffs, long flapped waistcoat, knee-breeches, and great shoe-buckles, was not carried off with the proper air, so that he presented a figure that would have made a good portrait of a captain of a Dutch privateer after having taken a capital prize. When he shouted in praise of the wine of Burgundy, it far rather suggested fine kegs of Schiedam. It was in "Mr. Nightingale's Diary," which followed, that he was inimitable. The late Miss Mitford, being present at the performance of this some time afterward, pronounced certain parts of his acting in this piece as something wonderful. Neither can it be said that Mr. Mark Lemon was quite at home in his part in the comedy, viz., that of "Sir Geoffrey Thornsides, a gentleman of good family and estate." He looked far more like a burly, wealthy Yorkshire brewer, who had retired upon something handsome. In the afterpiece he could hardly have been surpassed. Yet both the last-named parts in the comedy were fairly acted. Jerrold, also (a capital actor in certain parts), was hardly in his right element. The head and face of Jerrold were a good illustration of the saying that most people are like one or another of "our dumb fellow-creatures," for he certainly had a remarkable resemblance, in several respects, to a lion, chiefly from his very large, clear, round, undaunted, straightforward-looking eyes, the structure of the forehead, and his rough, unkempt, uplifted flourish of tawny hair. It was difficult to make such a face look like the foolish, half-scared country gentleman, "Mr. Shadowly Softhead;" but he enacted the part very well, notwithstanding. As a contrast to these, Mr. Frank Stone, the painter, presented a very grave, tall, stately full-length of the proud "Duke of Middlesex," whose dignity was astonished at his wife daring to take "such a liberty" as to give him a kiss; while the "Earl of Loftus" of Mr. Dudley Costello was even too elegant for a nobleman of the court of George I., and rather resembled a highly polished French marquis of the age of Louis Quatorze. The make-up of Mr. Egg as “David Fallen, Grub Street author,” etc., was such as only a fine painter could well have effected. Intellectual and refined amidst his seedy clothing; resentful of his hard lot, yet saddened by disappointment and semi-starvation; his thoughts appearing to oscillate between independence of character, his political hiring, and his hungry family in their miserable attic — such a countenance was presented as the stage has seldom seen, and is very unlikely to see again, except at rare and exceptional intervals. The Irish landlord of Mr. Fallen, “Paddy O’Sullivan,” was rendered to perfection by Mr. Robert Bell, whose gigantic stature of six feet four, “without his shoes,” long frieze coat, little round hat, ragged red wig, and highly painted, smiling, rubicund visage (reminding one of the Sompnour in the “Canterbury Tales”), presented a picture that even surpassed the effect of the rich brogue in which he blurted out the few words allotted to him. Tho minor parts of this play were cut down at nearly all the final rehearsals, in order to give “more words” to some of the principal characters, and have been reduced to mere shreds in the acting copies since published.

Some account of the after-piece, entitled “Mr. Nightingale’s Diary,” written jointly by Mr. Dickens and Mr. Mark Lemon (but never published), together with the ball and supper given by the Duke on the occasion, and the subsequent performances of the “Guild” at Manchester, Liverpool, Bath, Bristol, and other great provincial towns, must, for a time, be deferred.

CHAPTER XXXV.

They coovered poor Stephen Blackpool's face!

The crowd from the Old Hell Shaft pressed around him. Mr. Gradgrind ran to look at the sufferer's face, but in doing so, he trod on a daisy. He wept: and a hundred and sixty more of his

* It would seem that the striking want of poetical justice in the usually-received termination of this otherwise excellent story, wherein none of the good people were made happy, and the wicked were most inadequately punished, had caused the author to tremble for his popularity among the female portion of the community — who, it is well known, will stand no liberties of that description. He has therefore (apparently) re-written it on more orthodox principles; or (not improbably) got somebody else to re-write it for him; or (as is "barely possible") somebody else has re-written it for him without asking his leave. We hare no means of ascertaining the exact state of the case. The reader is requested to form his own opinion, and let us know at his earliest convenience. hairs turned gray. He would tread on no more daisies!

He was not, however, to be baulked in his humble, honest purpose of self-reform. As he passed over the common, a donkey kicked him. It reminded him that facts were stubborn things: and he had done with facts and stubbornness. He wept again.

“Rachel, beloved lass, art thou by me?”

“Ay, Stephen; how dost thou feel V

“Hoomble and happy, lass. I be grateful and thankful. I be obliged to them as have brought charges o’ robbery agin me; an’ I hope as them as did it will be happy an’ enjoy the fruits. I do only look on my being pitched down that theer shaft, and having all my bones broke, as a mercy and a providence, and God bless ev’rybody!”

“Stephen, your head be a wandering.”

“Ay, lass; awlus a muddle.”

“Will you take anything, Stephen?”

“I do hoombly thank thee for a good and trew lass thou hast awlus been to me; and I dunnot care if I do take a little soomut warm — wi’ a little sugar.”

The sobered man had still credit at the neighbouring tavern. In two seconds he appeared with a steaming glass of rum-and-water, scarcely stopping to sip it by the way.

“Can thou drink rum, Stephen?” asked Rachel, taking the tumbler from the hands of the sobered man for fear of accidents.

“I do hoombly and kindly thank thee, lass,” said poor Stephen; “I can drink anything,”

Rachel placed the goblet to his parched and quivering lips.

There was a moment of breathless silence. Mr. Bounderby rattled three-and-sixpence in his breeches pocket, and finding his ostentation was unnoticed, kicked a little boy down the Old Hell Shaft, Mr. Gradgrind purchased a pennyworth of violets from a blue-eyed flower-girl, and true to his new and trusting creed, accepted two counterfeit farthings as change for a sovereign without looking at them. The Whelp glared fiercely at the rum-and-water, and barked.

Stephen drank it, every drop. Finished. Down to the dregs. No heel-taps.

“I do hoombly thank thee, Rachel, good and trew lass as thou hast been to me; but I do feel much better.”

“Oh, here!” Mr. Bounderby blustered forward: “I’m not going to stand this. If a man suspected of robbing Josiah Bounderby, of Coketown’s Bank, is to feel ‘much better/ I should like to know what’s the use of Old Hell Shafts. There’s a touch of the gold-spoon game in that; and I’m up to the gold-spoon game — rather! And it wont go down with Josiah Bounderby. Of Coketown. Not exactly. Here! Where's a constable?"

There was none. Of course not. There never is, when wanted.

Mrs. Sparsit and Bitzer pressed officiously forward, and volunteered to take Stephen into custody.

"Shame!" cried the populace.

"Oh, I dare say," said Mr. Bounderby; "I'm a self-made man, and, having made myself, am not likely to be ashamed of anything. There, take him along."

There was a movement, as if for a rescue. The sobered man had been sober quite long enough without a fight, and tucked up his sleeves.

Stephen prevented this explosion.

"Noa, lads," he said, in his meek broken voice; "dunnot try to resky me. I be fond o' constables. I like going to prison. As for hard labour, I ha' been used to that long enough. Wi' regard to law — it's awlus a muddle."

"Off with him!" said Mr. Bounderby. "When I used to commit robberies, I never had any rum-and-water given to me. No, nor didn't talk about muddles. And I'm worth sixty thousand pounds, and have got ladies of family — ladies of family;" — he raised his voice to call attention to Mrs. Sparsit, who was ambling gently along with the submissive Stephen on her august shoulders — "acting as beasts of burden for me. Come up, madam!" And he gave Mrs. Sparsit a gentle touch of his whip, causing that high-nosed lady to prance a little.

They moved on, towards Coketown. The lights were beginning to blink through the fog. Like winking. The seven o'clock bells were ringing. Like one o'clock. Suddenly the tramp of horses and the fierce barking of a dog were heard.

With a wild cry, Sissy recognised Sleary's company galloping towards them — all mounted; Mr. Sleary himself, grown much stouter, on his wonderful trained Arab steed, Bolivar; J. W. B. Childers, who had apparently not had time to change his dress, as the Indian warrior on the celebrated spotted Pegasus of the Caucasus j Kidderminster following, on the comic performing donkey, Jerusalem.

A dog, far in advance of the horse-riders, dashed amongst the astonished crowd, and singling out Mr. Bounderby, seized him by the scruff of the neck.

“Thath wight, Mewwylegth,” cried Mr. S., coming up panting (in addition to his former lisp, advancing age had afflicted him with a difficulty in pronouncing his r’s). “Thath the vewy identical cove: pin him! Good dog!”

“Help! murder!” cried the bully of humility, struggling with the animal. “Will you see a man worth sixty thousand pounds devoured by a dog?”

The prospect seemed to afford the bystanders considerable satisfaction.

“Ith no uthe, Thquire,” said Sleary, calmly; “the dog wont let go hith hold of you;” and he added, in a hissing voice, “ith Jupeth dog!” K a

“It’s a lie,” Bounderby faltered; “I didn’t murder him — he did it himself. I never saw the man. He hit me first. I never spoke to a clown in my life. Tear this hound off.”

“Quite enough, Thquire,” said Sleary. “I call on everybody in the Queenth name to athit me in arethting thith man, Jothiah Bounderby, for the murder of my clown, Jupe, thickthteen yearthago.”

Sissy fainted into the Whelp’s arms. From that moment the latter quadruped resolved to lead a virtuous life.

Mrs. Sparsit and Bitzer, with the alacrity of timeservers, released Stephen, and seized on their former patron. Stephen slipped quietly away in the confusion of the moment, remarking, with a wink of satisfaction to Rachel, “Awlus a muddle!”

Merrylegs retained his hold on his victim’s throat. Like a vice.

“Murder!” cried Bounderby; “release me from this dog, or demon, and I will confess all.”

“Mewwylegth, come here, thir!”

Merrylegs released his victim.

“Well, then,” said the detected miscreant, desperately, — sixteen years ago I murdered the man, Jupe, to obtain possession of eighteen-pence,* with which I entered Coketown, and set up in business. And now, do your worst.”

The crowd recoiled in horror. The sobered man picked up Mr. Bounderby’s hat, that had dropped off in the scuffle, and immediately pawned it.

“Off with him!” cried Sleary, in a tone of theatrical authority, — ” to jail !”

To jail! to jail! to jail!

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Towards town. The crowd gathering. Like a snowball. Much dirtier, though. Rather.

“Bitzer.”

The whisper was so hoarse that the light-porter scarcely recognised his master’s tones.

“Sir?”

There is a trifling anachronism here. Bounderby having been represented as already prosperous at the time of Jupe’s disappearance. These little accidents, however, will happen in the best regulated plots.

“I have twenty sovereigns in my pocket. Let me slip away, and they are yours.”

“Thank you, sir; but I have calculated that, by letting you be locked up all night, and going back and robbing the Bank, I shall make a much better thing of it. You must please to remember that I have my way to make.”

“Will the key of the safe tempt you?”

“Thank you, sir; — that might be a consideration.”

Bounderby slipped it into the light-porter’s hand. In an instant he was gone, into the darkness, up an entry. In a few seconds, by a howl resembling the cry of a pack of hounds baffled in their scent, he knew that his escape had been discovered.

“There is no time to be lost,” he muttered. He entered a chemist’s shop.

“A pint of strychnine!”

“I beg your pardon, sir; but what do you want it for?”

“For a dog,” said Bounderby, gnashing his teeth fiercely, as he thought of Merrylegs.

“Thank you; — you can keep the change.”

He seized the poison with avidity, and rushed into the street. The cries of his pursuers came nearer. It was a fearful night — just the sort of night for a man to poison himself in. He placed the potion to his lips.

What appeared an animated mass of rags darted up from a dark corner, and seized the bottle from his hand.

“Aha!” said a drunken female voice, “ a sly drain, eh, old boy? Half shares, though. I haven’t had a sup of anything good these two hours.

Here's your health."

Ere he could arrest her movement, the drunken wife of Stephen Blackpool had drained the bottle to the dregs, and lay a squalid, loathsome corpse at his feet.

"Baffled, by Heaven!" cried Bounderby, spurning the lifeless object with his left highlow.

The pursuers were approaching. Their angry murmurs grew more and more distinct. The barking of the dog was terrible.

What was to be done?

Give himself up. To justice? To be hanged — by the neck — till he was dead? No! He had raised himself from nothing, and he was not the man to trample on his own origin, if he could help it.

Lights at the end of the street.

"Bow! wow! wow! G-r-r-r-r-r!"

The dog again! How he wished the lights were in an edible form, and might choke the infuriated quadruped!

"G-r-r-o-o-o-o-w! Yap!"

"He is gaining on him. Good dog! at him, Merrylegs! S — s — tt! Murderers, boy, murderers!"

"Bow-ow-ow-o-o-o-o-w! Yap!"

There is scarcely an inch between the muzzle of the avenging Merrylegs and the seat of the inexpressibles that were considered, scarce an hour ago, worthy to press the highest judicial seat of Coketown. Another leap, and he has him by the trousers!

A yell of exultation bursts from the infuriated multitude.

Smash! crash! the head of Bounderby strikes against a door. The brave old oak resists the shock manfully. Ha! it is the door of his own mill — the Fairy Palace. There is yet hope; the latch-key quivers in the lock: — squeak! creak! — the door yields. Bump! thump! It is barricaded from within, and the baffled Merrylegs stands in the street alone, with the yet palpitating seat of Mr. Bounderby's trousers in his extended jaws.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

His melancholy-mad elephants were at work. They were always at work — day and night. I shouldn't like to be a melancholy-mad elephant, to be always at work — night and day. Should you? Not that I don't now and then sit up all night myself. But on those occasions I am not melancholy. By no means. Nor in the elephantine line. Quite the contrary. Mr. Bounderby entered the engine-room. There was a window at the back, by which he might let himself down into the Warren's Blacking river that supplied the mill, and so swim as far as Liverpool. He was alone, — the night-watchman of course had gone out for the evening. He could hear the crowds battering at the door below. In a few minutes he would be in custody.

The melancholy-mad elephants occupied a good deal of room. As will be the case with illtempered asthmatic old gentlemen, the building that contained them seemed insufficient space for them to wheeze and squeeze, and groan and moan, and mutter and splutter in. It required the greatest precaution, on the part of Mr. Bounderby, to step over the foaming cylinders, exhausted receivers, cranks, levers, and what not, to reach the desired window in safety.

At length he opened it.

“Bow-ow-ow-ow! Gr-r-r-r!”

The dog again! Jupe's avenging angel! In at the window. Sixteen stories high! But of what is the dog not capable?

Bounderby fell back. Into what? Into the clutches of the melancholy-mad elephants. The fly-wheel caught him. Whirr! Burr! Whiz! Fiz! Round and round he went! He was a self-made man, but he had not made himself of sufficiently strong materials to resist the influence of the melancholy-mad elephants.

In the morning, a mother-of-pearl shirt button and a fragment of a broad blue cloth coat-skirt were all the remains of the once prosperous Josiah Bounderby, of Coketown!

* * * * *

Little remains to be told. Rachel and Stephen were married. The robbery of the bank was fixed upon Mrs. Sparsit and Bitzer. As the house of Bounderby, however, had never issued anything but forged notes, the culprits were soon detected in the attempt to pass some of them. Sissy married the reformed Whelp, and reared a large family of puppies. Mr. Gradgrind ended his days as a clown to Sleary's troop. He had had a lesson in the futility of facts, and during his engagement could never be prevailed upon to accept wages. He lived by borrowing sixpences of the rest of the company — as a penance.

Mr. James Harthouse returned from Jerusalem, determined to go in for the domestic virtues. He proposed to Louisa, and was accepted. They were happy.

Sleary's company went to America, and got engaged by Barnum. Of course they returned with fortunes. Sleary himself, in consideration of his disinterested efforts to secure Bounderby, was made Master of the Horse.

J. W. B. Childers won £150,000 upon the last Derby. The horse had been trained to lose by Sleary.

Kidderminster grew ten inches after the age of twenty-seven, and was immediately appointed to a colonelcy in the Scots Greys. The sobered man, ashamed of his former conduct, never became so again. Macchoakumchild was carried off by a severe attack of his own name.

Mrs. Sparsit and Bitzer were transported. The former, through her high connexions, was enabled to obtain a ticket-of-leave before the customary time had elapsed. She set up a boarding-house, and lived by poisoning gold-diggers. As she had amassed a considerable fortune by the time Bitzer obtained Ms ticket, the latter assassinated her for her property, and was executed.

And now, reader, let us love one another. If you will, I will. I can't say fairer. And so, God bless us all.

UNDER THE SHADOW OF BLEAK HOUSE

By J. Ashby-Sterry

From: The Shuttlecock Papers, A book for an idle hour, J. Ashby-Sterry, Tinsley Brothers, 1873, p.101-114

It is a lovely day. The sunshine is brilliant. Ramsgate is getting too hot, too noisy, and too dirty. It is crammed with blatant excursionists, and the shout of the raucous cad resoundeth from early morn to dewy eve: the dirty street preacher is never silent, and the voice of the nigger minstrel never is mute. It is a relief to get over here, to revel in the quiet, to bask in the sunshine, and to watch the ever-changing colours of the ocean; to listen to its music almost lulling me to slumber as it gently washes the foot of the cliff below me, It is tolerably hot even in Broadstairs to-day, but I bethought me I should find a breeze on the Fort Hill, and I have certainly found it. The sun is just getting a little behind a large house at my back, and throwing a long slip of shadow across the sward on which I am rolling. I am just at the junction of the shadow and the sunshine, so when I feel cool, by one turn of my body, I can roast, and when I get too hot, by another turn, I can cool myself. I am leaning on my elbows, my head is thrust into a stray bunch of sweet-smelling clover that is growing at the very edge of the cliff. I look right away towards Deal. By tracing a white line which marks the spray breaking on the Goodwin, I can just distinguish the Gull Light ship, and a long way further on I fancy I can see a speck on the waters that may be the light ship of the South Sand Head. Ever changing is the aspect of sea and sky to-day. There is none of the monotony, none of the heartless burnished appearance of a cloudless steely sky. There is light and shade of every variety. Long lines of purple shadow come and go on the waters. Little white-sailed yachts are dancing over the waves and dallying with the breeze like flirts of the ocean. Vast ships on the horizon appear not to move at all, and a long line of smoke marks the track of a steamer much nearer to France than to us. Looking over my left shoulder I can see something white flashing in the sunshine which happens to be the top of the North Foreland light-house, and an invigorating stray breeze from the North Sea cools my left cheek from time to time. There is a flagstaff close to me which rattles its cordage musically now and then, there is a coast guardsman with very white trousers and a very large collar, looking as if he were rehearsing the part of William, in Black-Eyed Susan, for an amateur performance at the Assembly Rooms. He carries a large telescope, which seems more like a piece of light artillery than an optical instrument, and with which he is continually taking shots at passing vessels. There is a young lady sitting on a bench reading a novel, there are two brown faced school-girls romping about the grass, there is a comical old gull pretending to be a tumbler pigeon, and there is bonny little Broadstairs with its tiny pier and its baby harbour sleeping in the sunshine before me. Behind me is Bleak House, where many years of his life lived Charles Dickens, and where many of his finest works were penned. What a romantic place this is to write in, is it not? What a glorious study to work in. Indeed, both from situation and association it would be impossible to find a better place for writing, were it not that one feels that so much superb work has been done on this very spot by so great an artist, that the mere craftsman is inclined to question whether it is worth while for him to write at all.

Directly I turned my back on the Granville this morning, and strolled along the cliff Broadstair-wards, I began to feel better. I seemed at once to get rid of the element which is so disagreeable during the height of the season at Ramsgate. I met not the Baron Bevis Marks on my way, neither did I encounter Lady Houndsditch, nor the Countess of Whitechapel. The young gentlemen who ape the manners and appearance of music-hall celebrities were conspicuous by their absence, and the class that makes us thankful that Ramsgate sands are well washed by the tide every day were in no wise represented. I walk round the wall of East Cliff Lodge, Sir Moses Montefiore's place, and think it would be just the place to suit me. The amount of pleasure I have had in fancying how comfortable I could be in houses that will never belong to me, how I would go somewhere in yachts I shall never possess, or how I would worship girls that I shall never marry, is something astonishing. The fields beyond East Cliff House were yellow with harvest, and the sheaves of corn looked glorious against the sparkling sea. I saw one or two very pretty pictures here, I should tell you. Two merry girls had made themselves a couch of corn sheaves and shawls, they had hoisted an umbrella, they were nestling together, almost cheek to cheek, and both reading out of the same book. Ah! I should like to be the favourite author of these young ladies, I think to myself as I pass by and they look lazily up and give me a passing glance from beneath drooping lashes. I should dearly love to pass a morning talking lazily to them or getting them to read to me as I lounged in a comfortable attitude against the corn sheaves. I pass on sadly. I hear the whirr of a reaping-machine in the distance sounding like a Lilliputian apoplectic express train, and I shake my head. I hate all these improvements; these new fangled ways of doing everything by machinery are right down detestable. However, I wade ankle-deep across a field of sweet-scented clover which somewhat restores my equanimity. The sweet scent that you encounter in many parts of the Isle of Thanet in summer time is remarkable. There is the scent of the sea, of clover, of hay, of tamarisk, of thyme, borne upon the breeze one after the other, sometimes separate, sometimes in combination: a scale of perfume, a harmony of sweet scents. I descend towards Dumpton Gap, and in a little nook on the other side, looking down from the cliff, do I see a very charming sight. I see a young lady “paddling” in the coolest possible manner and apparently enjoying it very much indeed. She had taken off her stockings, reefed her skirts and furled her frills in the most artistic fashion; she had a pair of tiny boots in her hand; she was dimpling the soft sand with her white little feet, was letting the ripples kiss her well shapen ankles, and had evidently made up her mind to get to Broadstairs by water.

For the sirens of Ceres or the sirens of the shore I cannot stay, for I am anxious to get to the end of my journey. I cross another field or two and I come in sight of Broadstairs. My first feeling is one of rage, for I see some new houses have been erected at the end nearest Dumpton. I begin to gnash my teeth, to stamp, to shake my fist at an imaginary Buggins, the builder. However, I find the houses in question might be worse, but I would have the natives of Broadstairs beware. Mr. Buggins is very fond of getting the thin end of the wedge in, and when once he gets any footing at all it is not long before he begins erecting his filthy stucco villas, and would do his best to speedily convert this pleasant quaint sea-side village into a maritime Cadopolis. I address a word of warning to the Broadstairians, I say beware of Buggins and cheap trains! If I were an inhabitant of the place I would get up an agitation in favour of only allowing a couple of trains to stop there in the course of the day, and, if possible, I would head a subscription towards disestablishing the railway station altogether. Having got over my indignation somewhat, I pass on. I come upon the old-fashioned what you may call “regular sea-side houses,” the houses with green balconies and green shutters, with curious little gardens, with hedges of tamarisk and queer “wooden railings. Rows of houses with quaint names. For instance, Nuckle’s Place. Who was Nuckle, and why should he have a place I should like to know? Was Nuckle ever harbour-master, commandant, mayor, magistrate, chief butler, topsawyer, or head bottle-washer at Broadstairs that he should have a row of houses named after him? What has Nuckle done that this lasting honour should be conferred upon him? I have a theory of my own about this. Hard by the row of houses of which I speak is the Assembly Rooms. I have a sort of notion that when balls and card parties took place here many years ago, Nuckle was the master of the ceremonies — he was the Angelo Cyrus Bantam, Esquire, of the place — and was usually known as Beau Nuckle, and though his figure has faded from Broadstairs, though balls are no longer held at the Assembly Rooms, his memory is preserved in a row of houses. I have no doubt Nuckle was quite as great a man at Broadstairs as Bantam was at Bath. But this by the way. The great characteristics of Broadstairs are its brightness and cleanliness: there is little of the frowsiness of seaside lodgings in any of the houses. Most of the windows are open, and all the doors, and many of the young ladies seem to pass the entire day in the balconies. The library is one of those delicious old “marine libraries” that I fancied had almost passed away. It has a reading-room, with a large brass telescope which makes you feel like a surveyor for Lloyd’s, and have a perpetual desire to see impossible things in the “offing.” It has a green baize-clothed table, which is almost suggestive of a cabinet council, and there is a solemnity about the room which induces you to carry on your conversation in subdued whispers. A capital place this room is to spend a wet day in, I can tell you, and run over the well-read collection of books, or, when it is too hot to go out, some very pleasant mooning can be done as you gaze upon the sea from the large bow window.

Beyond the library is the flagstaff, which stands in the middle of the green on the cliff side of the village. I do not know what this green is for. Whether it is for volunteers to exercise in, or for babies to roll in, I am unable to say. It would be a suitable place for some tiny agitator connected with that influential body, the Babies’ Rights Association to hold an indignation meeting about perambulators not being allowed on the pier, and it would be about big enough for such a purpose. Beneath the flagstaff on this green may be seen four or five melancholy gulls. Now a gull on a grass-plat is as awkward as a swan on a turnpike road. I should very much like to know why these melancholy gulls are always here. Are they fed at the expense of the town of Broadstairs like the pigeons are at Venice, when the bell in the Torre dell Orologio strikes two. Is there as much mystery with regard to the origin of the gulls of Broadstairs as there is in respect of the pigeons of Venice? You know in former times there was a chapel here — a portion of it, I believe, still exists — dedicated to “Our Lady of Broadstairs,” which was held in such veneration that ships sailing by lowered their topsails. I wonder whether “Our Lady of Broadstairs” was the patron saint of seabirds, and if they have always hovered about her shrine.

Before descending to the pier I lean upon the railings and gaze upon the little harbour, the row of bathing machines, the sandy bay with the children digging and paddling. I note an excellent idea on the sands, that is, little portable tents for the children to sit under and so keep them out of the broiling sun. There is that same coal-brig that you always see in Broadstairs Harbour, which seems especially retained to give a picturesque finish to the scene. The bathing is all over. The machines are hauled up high and dry, and a number of bathing costumes are hung on the railings. I hear a great deal of chattering and girlish laughter, a popping of corks and a jingling of glasses proceeding from the bow window to my left. I fancy they must be having luncheon, and uncommonly merry over it they seem to be sure. I descend a flight of steps, pass under the quaint old York Gate, and feeling somewhat athirst I look in at the Tartar Frigate and have a glass of ale. Here I find half-a-dozen ancient mariners having what they are pleased to call “toothfuls” of rum. They are a good, kindly set of men, as different from the ordinary sea-side boatmen as well may be. As a general rule, it costs you a pint of beer and a screw of tobacco every time you open your mouth to a seaside boatman. It is very different with the sturdy honest inhabitant of Broadstairs. You may talk to him for half-an-hour, and at the end of that time he will wish you a courteous good morning without hinting at any reward or refreshment. They never bore you to go out in their boats, or make your life miserable by insisting, whenever you walk down the pier, that it is “A nice day for a sail.” “What a queer, picturesque, pitched, patched, be-riveted, be-clamped old structure this pier is to be sure! What a deal of material Mr. J. C. Hook might find in it for one of his pictures. Look at the gigantic rough timbers, the strong ladders, the vast fusty rings, the coils of rope, the heaps of iron ballast, the anchors, the trawls, the blocks, the spars, the oars, the sailcloth, the nets that are distributed in picturesque confusion over this little pier. How everything seems to be made for strength and service, for rough and ready use and not for ornament; and yet how ornamental it all looks. Strolling down to the end of the pier we shall find very different to that of Ramsgate or the jetty at Margate. There is no boat to see in, nor are there any poor sea-sick passengers to jeer at. It almost seems like a private pier, and you look upon the little awning at the end as a subscription marquee, to which you would only be allowed to become subscriber after you had been proposed by one duchess and seconded by another. Being rather of a diffident disposition, I confess I do not feel as if I ought to intrude upon the large family party who are seated beneath the canvas. A gigantic black and white dog and his friend the Newfoundland come and look at me at first rather doubtfully, but I make friends with them and pat them. The black and white dog wags his tail and goes off to his master — a good-looking young fellow in a light grey suit — and looks at him, looks back at me and wags his tail violently as much as to say “he’s a new comer, but not half a bad sort when you know him.” Encouraged by this I take a seat beneath the awning and look around me.

They are a very quiet lot of people, a good many ladies and children and a few men. They are mostly engaged in reading and working, and one or two are sketching. A few bonny children are racing up and down the slope to the sea, and a little imp of mischief named Jessie is severely reprovved by her grown-up sister for spoiling her boots and embroidery by standing up to her knees in salt water. A few men are smoking outside the awning, but they refrain from doing so within as long as the ladies are present. The only disadvantage of being beneath the awning is that the seats are all on the slope, and you are perpetually sliding seawards or into somebody else’s lap, which is very embarrassing till you are used to it. But outside you can get every variety of seat. There are big timbers, vast stanchions, and comfortable posts, so that you can achieve almost any position you please. If you require shade you can repose beneath the life-boat or any of the other boats that are hauled up high and dry on the slip. If you like sunshine you can sit on the broad wooden edge of the pier, dangle your legs over the harbour, and gaze upon the village. Whilst I was there a nigger in a gay spotted muslin coat — who I suppose had come over on speculation from Ramsgate or Margate — walked jauntily down the pier and commenced thrumming his banjo and “yah-yahing” after the manner of nigger minstrels. He looked under the awning: he thrummed his banjo violently. One or two people looked at him languidly, nobody smiled; every one went on with their sketching, their working, or their reading. He saw it was a hopeless case: he had not the heart to sing a song, nor ask a conundrum, and he went slowly thrumming his banjo back again as if he were trying to play a funeral dirge, and I saw him no more. His merriment had departed and his voice was mute, and he evidently felt almost as much out of place as he would in a Belgravian drawing-room. I saw a gentleman walking about the pier in a coat with gilt buttons and a gold-embroidered collar: he looked like a port admiral at the very least, but I have a sort of idea that he may be the harbour-master. Another gentleman in plain clothes and a grey moustache looked very much like the commandant of the garrison in mufti — if Broadstairs has a garrison, a matter which I am prepared somewhat to doubt. Indeed, I very much doubt whether Broadstairs has a policeman. I know I have never seen one there. I believe that they keep a tame beagle, but he only comes out on Sundays. You will notice a building at the entrance to the pier decorated with figureheads of wrecked ships. This is the look-out and seamen’s reading-rooms. Do not forget to pay it a visit, and do not omit to give something towards its funds, and if you are a resident for a time make a point of becoming a regular subscriber. And whilst you have your hand in your pocket remember to drop as much as you can conveniently spare into the box of the Lifeboat Association which is close handy. I do not know any place for its size where you can get such a variety of views as Broadstairs. It is a village that grows upon you the more you see it. There is a simplicity about the whole place which is indescribably charming, especially when coming from the racket of Ramsgate and the boisterous hilarity of Margate. I do not think it is a place likely to be spoiled by the “jolly dog,” the music-hall snob, nor the blatant cad, simply because there would be no attraction for him in the place. There are no steamboats to see come in, there is no German band with an attenuated flageolet and a cracked trombone, there are no “harmonic meetings” at public-houses, no niggers, no Punch and Judy, no indecorous bathing, nor any of those light amusements in which the “jolly dog,” the music-hall snob, and the blatant cad find especial joy. But for health, for quiet, for mooning, and for meditation, Broadstairs is superb. Anybody who is a potterer by profession and a mooner by education will enjoy himself vastly at this little village. You will soon know every one by sight, and those who have a sympathy with unknown people find a vast pleasure in imagining their histories, and in watching their doings will have an ample fund of amusement during the whole of his stay.

Having mooned about the pier for a considerable time, I mount up the Fort Hill, past a group of picturesque cottages, and arrive at Bleak House. I look across the luxuriant garden and the smoothly shaven lawn. I walk right round to the back and note the dense shrubs, the fig-tree peeping over the wall, and the wall itself perfectly matted with ivy and vegetation. I then come back, I roll down on the grass, and I-look up at the house and wonder and speculate. I wonder whether it was in that room with a large window looking towards the flagstaff that the wonderful description of the storm in "David Copperfield" was written. Or was it in the room looking across the garden on the other side? I should much like to know which was the study where Charles Dickens did his works; where the great master toiled and produced those characters, those scenes in which we believe so implicitly, and which have given such infinite pleasure to thousands and thousands wherever the English tongue is spoken. How one feels all this, lounging here in the sunshine, and looking up at the very windows where Dickens must have gazed from in the pauses of his work. I bury my face in the sweet-scented clover and gaze through it on the sea, and listen to the gentle splash of the waves, and feel the salt breeze on my cheek. And then comes a dream of pleasant fancies which the great novelist has painted for us, and in so doing has given many a gleam of sunshine to weary life. I think of Little Paul and Florence, of "what the waves were always saying." Of grand old Captain Cuttle, of Major Bagstock, and of Dombey. Of Little Nell, Dick Swiveller and the incomparable Marchioness; of Peggotty, Ham, Em'ly, and delightful Baby Dora; of Nicholas Nickleby, the Cheeryble Brothers, Mark Tapley, the Crummles's, the Phenomenon and Morleena Kenwigs; of Mr. Pickwick, the immortal Sam Weller, Stiggins, of poor Joe, of the detestable Chadband — I heard Chadband preach at Ramsgate this morning — and Jarndyce v. Jarndyce. Delicious dimpled Bella Wilfer — the "boofer lady" — Mr. Boffin, Wegg, the Veneerings, Inspector Bucket, Little Dorrit, Flintwinch, Clennam, the Tite Barnacles, Mr. Micawber, Guppy, Rosa Budd, Scrooge, Tiny Tim, Tilly Slowboy, Dot, Trotty Veck, Tom Pinch, Westlock, Barnaby Rudge, the Willetts, Sim Tappertit, Dolly Varden — how different to the Dolly Vardens of Ramsgate ! — and Miss Miggs. Of Oliver Twist, of Sykes and Nancy — the last time I heard Charles Dickens read was when he gave the marvellously tragic impersonation of these two characters — of Mr. Pumblechook, Miss Havisham, Pip, Joe, Mr. Jaggers, the admirable “Wemmick, and Estella. I dream of all these people and hundreds more, of marvellous descriptions of scenery and graphic delineations of character, and I think sorrowfully of the unsolved “Mystery of Edwin Drood.” Whilst I have been pondering the shadow cast by Bleak House has widened and lengthened, it has spread over my little knoll across my bunch of clover, and has caused the cliff to cast a deep shade over the dancing waters. Somewhat slowly and sadly do I gather up my papers, and with a regretful glance at the mansion that has so many pleasant memories associated with it, I arise and pass from under the shadow of Bleak House into the summer sunshine.

THE WOODEN MIDSHIPMAN

By J. Ashby-Sterry

Going down Leadenhall Street one day, I paused, as was my custom, at the door of the Wooden Midshipman, and thought of the changes he has seen since the days of Dombey and Son.

I found the Midshipman looking precisely the same as he had looked ever since I have known him, and as he looked, I imagine, many years before I had the pleasure of making his acquaintance: "With his quadrant at his round black knob of an eye, and its figure in the old attitude of indomitable alacrity, the midshipman displayed his elfin small clothes to the best advantage, and, absorbed in scientific pursuits, had no sympathy with worldly concerns." Changes have taken place, and are taking place, under his very nose. Gigantic alterations, disregard of old customs and upheavals of old neighbourhoods, waivings of ancient rights and discontinuance of time-honoured privileges, have come to pass in his immediate vicinity, and yet the Little Man is unmoved. He still stands high and dry at his post of observation, and lets the stream of progress and what the world calls enlightenment and improvement sweep beneath his feet unheeded.

With the London of Charles Dickens I have been familiar from my youth. When I first began “to take notice” and “to run alone,” the greater part of it existed intact, and one of my chief pleasures was to wander about the localities he had described with such photographic exactness and such rich pictorial effect, and live his stories over again with their real scenery. The house of Mr. Dombey still exists on the shady side of that “dark, dreadfully genteel street.” I often pass it now, and look up at the window of the room where Little Paul died. Do ‘not say, my dear sir, or my dear madam, as the case may be, that this is all fancy. I tell you that constant study of such matters has made me infallibly accurate, and if you come with me, I will point you out the actual house, and show you the very window.

The ruthless scythe of “improvement” has, I am sorry to say, effectually mown out of existence many pleasant oases in our Great Sahara of bricks and mortar. At one time I could have taken you, down curious lanes, through odd passages and secluded squares, to Todgers’s. It was difficult enough for the uninitiated to find, but when found, you would feel bound to admit that it was Todgers’s, and no other. It would not surprise you the least to meet the Miss Pecksniffs under the escort of their cousin, Jonas Chuzzlewit, coming along the street. I have often encountered Mr. Jinkins in this locality, and one day I am quite certain I saw the shock-head of Bailey junior protruding from a first-floor window. At the period I speak of, I could have shown you the house of Mr. Sampson Brass in Bevis Marks, which Mr. Richard Swiveller described as commanding an uninterrupted view of over the way, and being pleasantly situated within a few minutes’ walk of round the corner. Through the barred kitchen window half underground I have sometimes fancied I saw the Marchioness at one of her “make-believe” banquets.

Not a great distance from this spot might have been seen the quaint, quiet, out-of-the-way square where was situated the business of Messrs. Cheeryble Brothers, where Mr. Tim Linkinwater resided, and where Mr. Nicholas Nickleby had his first insight into commercial life. I remember paying a visit to the “Saracen’s Head,” Snow Hill, when it was in course of demolition. I suppose I was the very last visitor to the coffee-room where Mr. Squeers, of Dotheboys Hall, used to receive his pupils, and when I left the room where Mr. John Browdie had that famous supper, the plaster was falling about my ears, and the walls looked by no means safe. And that reminds me I have seen the real Dotheboys Hall, near Bowes, in Yorkshire. A few years ago it was standing, and I daresay it is yet in existence. But hold! I must not think of venturing out of London with my Dickensian recollections, or this paper will have no end.

There was a time when I could have shown you Quilp's apartments on Tower Hill, even the very room where Mrs. Jiniwin twisted off the shrimp's head and wished it had been that of her son-in-law, and if you had no objection to prowl about a shy and unsavoury neighbourhood, I might have given you a private view of Quilp's place of business, and the yard where he broke up his ships into such very small pieces that people were inclined to question whether he broke any at all, and whether ship-breaking was not a blind for a business of a less reputable and more lucrative character. I know also the queer passages and the odd galleries at the "George Inn" in the Borough. Dickens is said to have shifted the name in order that it should not be too closely identified. I could point out the corner of the yard where Mr. Pickwick first encountered Sam Weller, and the room where the famous interview took place between Miss Wardell and Mr. Alfred Jingle on the one side, and Mr. Pickwick, Mr. Perker, and the Squire on the other.

I have gazed upon the house of Mrs. Bardell in Goswell Street, where Mr. Pickwick was unfortunate enough to have lodgings, and I have wondered that the benignant philosopher could have been content with such limited accommodation, chops and tomato sauce notwithstanding. Have I not spent many a pleasant evening in Traddles' room in Gray's Inn, and thought about Mrs. Traddles and her pretty sisters — Beauty, Sarah, Louisa, Margaret, and Lucy? Do I not know the rooms in Buckingham Street where David Copperfield gave his famous dinner-party? Could I not have knocked at the very door of the house in Lant Street where Mr. Bob Sawyer and Mr. Ben Allen conducted themselves in such uproarious fashion?

I was acquainted with the establishment of Chivery and Co., hard by Horsemonger Lane Gaol, and I remember, too, one wet, gruesome, foggy day strolling down a muddy court in the Borough, and gazing on the remains of the old Marshalsea Prison; I recollect looking into that hideous structure of red brick and stone, the church of Saint George the Martyr, and pausing for a time in the vestry where Little Dorrit and Maggie slumbered so soundly on the parish registers and pew-cushions early on that dismal rainy morning. I was familiar with Turveydrop's Dancing Academy, I knew the corner where Silas Wegg established his stall, the queer little no thoroughfare where Miss Tox resided, the bow-windowed riverside house, down Limehouse way, where Bill Barley growled and drank rum-and-water, and the situation of the offices of Dombey and Son.

And after all, there was no portion of the whole of London so prolific in Dickensian reminiscences as the City. You saw it at every turn, in the ancient churches, hemmed in on all sides by gigantic warehouses, in their melancholy deserted graveyards, with their ragged attenuated grass, their blackened trees and neglected gravestones. In the odd boarding-houses and unaccountable inns that had buried themselves up strange courts, and lurked, half hidden, in unaccountable alleys, and seemed to apologize for their presence in quiet behind-the-age squares. In the spacious halls of opulent companies, which showed but an old-fashioned porch in a narrow quiet lane, but which presented to those who were permitted to enter their portals a superb range of apartments teeming, mayhap, with old furniture and valuable pictures, and doubtless giving on a quiet garden, worth no one knows what a square foot for building purposes, but preserved from the ravages of Buggins the Builder, merely to gladden the eyes of the plump City sparrows, the master, the wardens, and the clerk of these most worshipful corporations.

You might find countless reminders of the works of the Great Novelist in the curious old banking-houses, in the mouldy old counting-houses where so much money was made; in the difficult to find but cosy chop-houses where you could get a chop or a steak — and such a chop or a steak — hissing hot from the gridiron; in the methodical old clerks, the octogenarian housekeepers, the corpulent beadles in their splendid gaberdine, and the “characters” who kept stalls at the street corners and sold anything you please from fruit in season to dolls' coal-scuttles. In the ticket-porters, the bankers'-clerks chained to their pocket-books, the porters, the dockmen, the carters, the carriers, the brokers, the brokers' men, and the brokers' boys, who touched their hats, who hurried along, who laboured, who smacked their whips, who loaded and unloaded, who sampled, who noted, and who scampered, who grew prematurely grey, who became quickly furrowed, and who waxed old long before their time in the everlasting struggle for so much per cent, from year's-end to year's-end.

Down by the waterside, along Thames Street, through the narrow lanes and passages leading thereto, you continually saw some spot, some character or incident that recalled something in a novel by Charles Dickens. In the picturesque old wharves, with their gigantic cranes, their odd-shaped cabin-like counting-houses, their unaccountable sheds, their vast beams and supports, their gigantic scales and weighing-machines, their glimpses of the river, with its red-funnelled steamers, its picturesque billyboys, its forests of masts and elaborate tracery of rigging. As you listened to the whirr of the crane, the yeo-yeo of the sailors, the clink-clank of the windlass — over and over again, some well-remembered passage in one of your favourite volumes would recur to you.

There were also many ancient shops, which had existed in exactly the same place, with apparently the same goods in the window and the same shopman behind the counter ever since you could recollect, and for aught you knew ever since your grandfather could recollect. I can call to mind not a few of these. There was a glove-shop — the proprietor looked as if he might have been an under-secretary in Mr. William Pitt's Cabinet — there was a chemist's shop up a court; there was a tea-shop; there was a button-shop; there was a law-stationer's ; there was a print-shop; there was a fishing-tackle shop and a silversmith's. These were of the oldest of old fashions; their proprietors were the most old-fashioned of old-fashioned people, and they all did business in a most old-fashioned way. All these shops had a distinct Dickensian flavour about them, but most of them have been now swept away in order to make room for the palatial buildings which are now crowding the City, and gradually altering its entire character.

Time after time in visiting the City have I grieved to find one after another of these shops removed, and other quaint corners and ancient landmarks swept away altogether. One, however, always remained, and that had perhaps the most distinct connection and association with Charles Dickens of any spot in the City — namely, the Wooden Midshipman in Leadenhall Street. Everyone knows the Wooden Midshipman, and everyone knows the important figure it makes in "Dombey and Son." To myself this shop is especially interesting. When I was a boy, the very first book of Dickens's that I read was "Dombey and Son." Going through Leadenhall Street shortly afterwards, I noted the Wooden Midshipman, and at once “spotted” it as the original of Sol Gills’s residence. The description is so vivid and exact that it is unmistakable. It was many years after that I knew, for an actual fact, that this was really the shop that was so graphically sketched in the novel.

Passing down the street only the other day, I paused once more at the door of the Wooden Midshipman. I looked in at the window. Everything looked pretty much as usual. But stay! I see a white placard in a prominent position, and which startles me as if I had seen a ghost. The placard is to the effect that the business is being removed to One hundred and fifty-six Minories, on account of the premises being pulled down for improvement. “He was a callous, obdurate, conceited midshipman, intent on his own discoveries, and caring as little for what went on about him, terrestrially, as Archimedes at the taking of Syracuse.” He is “a callous, obdurate, conceited midshipman,” for despite this unlooked-for catastrophe, this terrible calamity, he stands at the door looking as blithe and gay and contented as he has looked any time I suppose during the past century. Men may come and men may go, but he observes for ever.

He has outlived most of his compeers, and he has seen many changes in Leadenhall Street. Long before the palatial mansion of John Company, over the way, was disestablished and pulled down, he was an institution in the street. I have no doubt that he often gazed upon Charles Lamb, who generally came to his office in the India House very late in the morning, but as he pointed out in reply to the expostulations of an indignant chief, he made up for it by leaving very early. I have no doubt that the gentle Elia often exchanged winks with the Midshipman when the former was “leaving early,” in order to enjoy a ramble at Islington, or a merry dinner at some rare old City tavern with congenial companions.

This quaint old-fashioned shop is almost the last of a number of quaint old-fashioned buildings which, but a few years ago, abounded in Leadenhall Street, especially on this side of the way. It has but little changed in appearance since it was first opened in 1773, only six years after the publication of the first nautical almanac. It was established by Mr. William Heather as a “sea chart, map, and mathematical instrument warehouse,” “where may be had,” we are informed, “Hadley’s Quadrants and Sextants of all Sizes, neatly mounted with two Parallel Glasses, accurately divided by the Patent Machines, and warranted good; Gunter’s Scales, Sliding Scales, Sectors, Cases of Instruments, and Compasses of all sorts; Sea Telescopes from One to Three Feet long, with Four or Six Glasses, &c.” Mr. Heather was succeeded by Mr. J. W. Norie in 1814, who was joined by Mr. George Wilson in 1834. Hence the firm of Norie and Wilson, under which style the business is still carried on by Mr. Charles Wilson and his sons.

The Wooden Midshipman has probably seen more of City business and its various fluctuations and phases during the past century than most people. When he first commenced taking his observations there were plenty of people remaining who remembered acutely the losses they had sustained during the South Sea Bubble. Change Alley and Garraway’s Coffee-House wore very nearly as picturesque an aspect as they present in the late Edward Mathew Ward’s famous picture. In those days the City merchant was a man of considerable importance and not a little sense. He “lived over the shop,” he and his wife and family resided at the place of business; they patronized the City shops and the City markets, and on Sunday they might be found filling a gigantic black oaken pew in one of the fine old City churches.

Clubs were then unknown in the City; but there were grand old taverns and cosy coffee-houses, where the City merchant could smoke his “pipe of Virginia” and discuss the news of the day, and crack a bottle of wine of a vintage impossible to obtain in the present day. In the good old times there was one post a day and that not a remarkably heavy one; news travelled slowly and with uncertainty; prices remained steady from one week’s end to another; and ruin or prosperity depended more on honest labour and application than secret information, the flash of the electric current, or the juggling of the Stock Exchange. In those days commerce was not chicanery, neither was business a spasm.

When news came it was generally pretty correct, and people had time to talk it over and master every detail of the information before the next budget arrived. Nowadays you may receive terrible intelligence at breakfast-time and have it contradicted long before luncheon. There has been plenty of news discussed in this ancient shop in bygone times, you may be well assured; there have been many fierce arguments across that age-polished counter and much speculation over charts and newspapers in the little cabin-like back parlour. The place must have been a “going concern” when the news came of the Battle of Lexington, and I can imagine how the ancient captains and the young apprentices talked there by the hour together concerning the murder of Captain Cook. Indeed, I have a sort of notion that Captain Cook called at “Heather’s” for some nautical instruments and charts just before starting on the disastrous expedition. During the Gordon Riots, I will be bound, Mr. William Heather trembled for his shop-windows. He probably, being a prudent man, kept them closely shuttered, closed his Nautical Academy, and gave his students a holiday, and doubtless the Wooden Midshipman) being a prudent midshipman, retired from his position at the door and sought shelter under the counter till the storm was over.

Within these walls there must have been considerable wrangling, too, when the independence of the United States of America was first acknowledged. How the Irish Rebellion of ‘98 must have been talked over and the Treaty of Arniens discussed! Cannot you imagine the sensation caused in this old-fashioned shop when “Boney” might be expected to land every day? and cannot you fancy the joy and the sorrow that pervaded this Naval Academy when news came of the Battle-of Trafalgar and the death of Nelson? The place is a good deal associated with Nelson. I daresay he had been there many times himself. In the little back parlour is an excellent portrait of the hero of Trafalgar, said to have been painted for Lady Hamilton. There is also a curious cup, with the initials “H. N.” upon it. Besides this, there is a very comfortable armchair, bearing this inscription on a brass plate: “This was Lord Nelson’s favourite chair when he was captain of the Boreas frigate. Presented by his master, James Jamieson, to Wm. Heather, being part of the property purchased by J. W. Norie and Wilson in Leadenhall Street, London.” I wonder whether the little officer wore a bit of crape round his arm on the occasion of Nelson’s funeral, or if he were hit by any of the bullets that were flying about in the neighbourhood when Sir Francis Burdett was committed to the Tower.

When the news came of the Battle of Waterloo the Midshipman must have been quite a veteran, and the establishment over which he presided as well known and as widely respected as any in the City of London. Still, I will be bound, notwithstanding the progress of the times, the gossips assembled, and though they presumably came in to buy one of Hadley’s quadrants, a case of instruments, or a sea-telescope, they remained to talk. I should fancy pupils in the Naval Academy neglected plane sailing, traverse sailing, and middle latitude sailing, during such times. The embryo admirals who were trying to reduce the time at ship to the time at Greenwich, to correct the observed altitude of the moon, to find the true amplitude, or the true azimuth, who were endeavouring to observe the angular distance between the sun and moon, and who were puzzling their brains over parallax, refraction, or semi-diameter, who were nearly driving themselves silly over natural sines and proportional logarithms, would quickly shunt all such uninteresting “studies in favour of discussions concerning La Belle Alliance, La Haye Sainte, Hougoumont, the Duke of Wellington, Prince Blucher, and Sir Thomas Picton.

One can easily picture the wordy warfare in this curious old mansion during the trial of Queen Caroline, the surprise manifested when omnibuses first ran, and how people shook their heads over the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway, and said the unfortunate death of Mr. Huskisson was a “judgment.” The Wooden Midshipman, notwithstanding all these changes, still stuck to his post, and still made his observations on the stirring events of the age. Among other things he observed were the passing of the first Reform Bill, the Abolition of Slavery, the introduction of lucifer matches, and the burning of the Houses of Parliament. He heard the cheers and joy-bells for the accession of Queen Victoria; he saw the glare of the conflagration at the Royal Exchange, and heard the ancient clock fall into the flames, playing, “There is no luck about the house.” He noted the introduction of the penny postage, the imposition of the Income Tax, and the repeal of the Corn Laws. He has been at his post from the time people clamoured for free trade till the period they have discovered it to be a mistake. He has been there through at least four notable French revolutions. He was a witness of the mourning crowd that thronged the city on the occasion of the funeral of the Duke of Wellington. He saw the people rushing down Cornhill when peace was proclaimed after the Russian War in 1855; and he heard the great bell of Saint Paul’s boom forth to all men at midnight the sad intelligence of the death of the Prince Consort. He has existed from the old days of lanterns and oil-lamps to the days of gas and electricity, from the time of the ancient and decrepit “Charlies” to the time of the well-organized police force. He has seen the navy become well-nigh perfect as a sailing fleet, and seamanship and navigation brought to the highest point of excellence. He has remained to see the sailing ships knocked out of time by steamers, and the line-of-battle ship almost superseded by the steam ram. He has seen the whole system of commerce utterly changed by the introduction of penny post, railways, steamships, and the electric telegraph.

A more popular little officer in his own domain than our friend it would be difficult to find. He is reverentially regarded and carefully looked after by all. Fifty years ago the street-boys did not treat him with respect; they jeered at him and gave him sly taps as they passed by. Old Sam, an eccentric shopman — there have been a good many extraordinary characters connected with this place notably an old-fashioned manager, whom it is said bore an extraordinary resemblance to Sol Gills — was always lying in wait for these rascals — like Betsy Trotwood did for the donkey-boys — and many a time has he chased them down Cornhill with a good stout cane, and soundly be-larrupped them over against Saint Michael's Alley. At one time the Little Man used to get his hands severely abraded by passing porters carrying loads, and was continually being sent into dock to have a fresh set of knuckles provided. But still, unless for these accidents and his going to get a new coat, he was always at his post all day long. If he was absent the inquiries would be frequent. Old pupils, who had become distinguished naval officers — and the academy has turned out not a few in its time — would pop in to inquire what had become of the genius of the place, and many have been the offers to buy him outright and remove him. Several Americans have recently offered his proprietors very large sums if they might be allowed to purchase him and take him to New York. It is furthermore on record that King William the Fourth, on riding through Leadenhall Street on his way to the Trinity House, raised his hat to him as he passed by.

All these details are of very great interest, but they pale before the romantic charm that has been thrown over the quaint little figure and its surroundings by Charles Dickens. It is with a sad heart that I accept the courteous invitation of Mr. Wilson to take a last look at the premises, and listen to much curious gossip about the old shop and its frequenters by Mr. J. W. Appleton, who for many years has been the principal hydrographer to the establishment. The interior of the shop, with its curious desks and its broad counter — under which it may be remembered Rob the Grinder used to make his bed — is fully as old-fashioned as its exterior. Here, it may be remembered, Mr. Brogley, the broker, waited during the consultation between Sol Gills, Walter, and Captain Cuttle. And here it was the aforesaid broker filled up the time by whistling softly among the stock, “rattling weather glasses, shaking compasses as if they were physic, catching up keys with loadstones, looking through telescopes, endeavouring to make himself acquainted with the use of the globes, setting parallel rulers astride on to his nose, and amusing himself with other philosophical transactions.” Here the Chicken waited and amused himself by chewing straw, and giving Rob the Grinder the unspeakable satisfaction of staring for half an hour at the conqueror of the Nobby Shropshire One. Here it was also when Captain Cuttle had the management of the business a customer came and inquired for some especial nautical instrument. “Brother,” says the Captain, “will you take an observation round the shop?” “Well,” says the man, “I’ve done it.” “Do you see wot you want?” says the Captain. “No, I don’t,” says the man. “Do you know it wen you do see it?” says the Captain. “No, I don’t,” says the man. “Why, then, I tell you wot, my lad,” says the Captain, “you’d better go back and ask wot it’s like outside, for more don’t I!” The entire shop and its odd corners, its quaint cupboards, its glass cases, and its chart drawers, seem as familiar to me as if I had served a long apprenticeship to Sol Gills.

I pass from the shop up a panelled staircase with a massive hand-rail and spiral balusters to the upper rooms. I look in at Walter’s chamber, with its comprehensive view of the parapets and chimney-pots, and see the place in the roof where Rob the Grinder kept his pigeons. I spend some time in a cheerful panelled apartment, which at one time was the bedchamber of Sol Gills, but which was occupied by Florence when she fled from her father and took refuge with Captain Cuttle. Do not you recollect what trouble the good-hearted old captain had to make this room fit to receive its guest? Cannot you call to mind how he “converted the little dressing-table into a species of altar, on which he set forth two silver teaspoons, a flower-pot, a telescope, his celebrated watch, a pocket-comb, and a song-book, as a small collection of rarities that made a choice appearance?” Do not you remember with what loving care and tenderness he greeted and watched over her? How often he tramped up and down that ancient staircase to make inquiries, and how, on the night of Walter’s return, he shouted gleefully through the keyhole, “Drownded, a’nt he, pretty?” as some relief to his feelings. Two more faithful friends that Florence had in her loneliness than Captain Cuttle and her dog, Diogenes, it would be difficult for any woman to have.

Half expecting to meet the good old captain in the way, I creep slowly down the quaint old staircase. I gain the shop once more, and pass down a dark, narrow flight of steps. Do you know what I come here for? I come down to see the cellar where the two bottles of old Madeira were kept. One of them was drunk when Walter first went to the house of Dombey and Son — to Dombey, Son, and Daughter; and the other, “a bottle that has been long excluded from the light of day, and is hoary with dust and cobwebs, has been brought into the sunshine, and the golden wine within sheds a lustre on the table,” many years after, to Walter and his wife. “Other buried wine grows older as the old Madeira did in its time, and dust and cobwebs thicken on the bottles.” I find I am mumbling this to myself, as I once more emerge in the daylight, and sit down to rest in the cabin-like back parlour in Lord Nelson’s favourite armchair.

It is well-nigh impossible for me to catalogue the scenes, the pictures, and the characters that flit across my brain as I gaze through the skylight overhead, or cast my eyes round the walls of this quaint little room. Here was Florence brought as a little child when she was found by Walter, and here she came with Susan Nipper to take leave of him before he went on his voyage. It was in this identical room that the famous conference concerning the loss of the Son and Heir at which Sol Gills, Captain Cuttle, Susan Nipper, Florence, and Jack Bunsby were present. It was on that occasion that the great commander of the Cautious Clara delivered his famous oracular opinion, “Whereby, why not? If so, what odds? Can any man say otherwise? No. Avast then!” This strikes one as being very much more original than Nelson’s “England expects every man will do his duty,” or Wellington’s “Up Guards and at ‘em.” Here it was, too, that Captain Cuttle, after the disappearance of Sol Gills, took possession; here that worthy had a service every Sunday night for the benefit of that snivelling young hypocrite, Rob. Here did the captain interview Mr. Toots on sundry and various occasions, here in presence of the mortal Bunsby did he read the last will and testament of Solomon Gills, and the letter to Ned Cuttle, and here was he discovered, after many weeks’ hiding, by Mrs. MacStinger and her demonstrative children, Alexander, Juliana, and Chowley.

It was to this odd-shaped, snug, queer little panelled parlour came poor Florence and her faithful Diogenes, when she fled from her brutal father and the grim cold house. Here did the captain cook that marvellous little dinner, which makes you quite hungry to read about. “Basting the fowl from time to time as it turned on a string before the fire, making hot gravy in a second little saucepan, boiling a handful of potatoes in a third, never forgetting the egg-sauce in the first, and making an impartial round of boiling and stirring with the most useful of spoons every minute. Besides these cares, the captain had to keep an eye on a diminutive frying-pan, in which some sausages were hissing and bubbling in a most musical manner; and there never was such a radiant cook as the captain looked in the height and heat of these functions; it being impossible to say whether his face or his glazed hat shone the brighter.” Here, too, did Walter Gay return so unexpectedly. Here did a certain weatherbeaten pea-coat, and a no less weather-beaten cap and comforter come bundling in one night, and to the great delight of everybody turned out to be the old Instrument-maker, after all. And it was from this room that Florence and Walter departed to be married in the ancient city church, not far distant. It was here that —

But stay! It is impossible to chronicle one quarter of the fun, the pathos, the humour, the charity that haunt the four irregular walls of this ship-shape little chamber. I arise and pass out into the din of Leadenhall Street. I find The Wooden Midshipman still standing at the door “callous, obdurate, and conceited” as ever, observing the omnibuses and the hansom cabs as earnestly as he did the hackney coaches aforetime, and apparently quite oblivious that his century of observations in Leadenhall Street is drawing to a close.

Since writing the above the whole place has been demolished, and The Wooden Midshipman, in his old home, as Charles Dickens pictured him, only now exists in the magic pages of “Dombey and Son.”

MISS BETSEY TROTWOOD'S

By J. Ashby-Sterry

This morning I was strolling through the marketplace at Dover, and I paused before a stall containing a miscellaneous collection of old iron, bent brass candlesticks, second-hand concertinas, dilapidated toys, and a few shabby old books. I looked through the books, hoping I might pick up a bargain — I never do pick up bargains — but they were none of them rare, and most of them were ragged. Among the raggedest of the lot was a copy of “David Copperfield.” It had evidently been read till it had fallen to pieces. I did not buy it, because I have one or two sound copies, and I know the work pretty well by heart. But it immediately recalled to my mind David’s connection with Dover, and I bethought me that I had never yet discovered the abode of Miss Trotwood.

It was all very fine to talk about discovering Miss Trotwood’s house, but how was it to be done? Probably the good lady is less known here now than when David Copperfield inquired after her, and there are most likely none of her friends now left in Dover. You may possibly recollect that the boatmen in David’s time were pleased to be unfeeling and facetious when he made inquiries. They opined that she lived in the South-Foreland Light; that she was made fast to the great buoy outside the harbour, and could only be visited at half-tide, that she was locked up in Maidstone Jail for child-stealing, and that she had been seen to mount a broom and make direct for Calais. The fly-drivers and the shopkeepers too, made merry over his misfortune and failed to give him any more satisfactory information. Now, if I were to address any of the brown-faced boatmen who may be seen smoking pipes, leaning against posts, or ruminating on the weather as they loll on capstans, they might possibly suggest that it was “werry dry work” giving information, but they would give it to the best of their ability. The Dover shopkeepers, too, are all so affable and polite that they would take the greatest pains possible to enable me to find the house of which I was in search.

If I were to hail that merry-looking fly-driver and say, “Drive me to Miss Trotwood’s,” I feel certain he would say, “Yes, sir,” smartly, as if he knew all about it. Then he would hesitate and look round and say, “I know the name, sir, but can’t recollect the address; somewhere on the Marine Parade, ain’t it?” It sounds so as if she ought to live there. You can fancy her in one of the best houses — a rich old sister of General Trotwood, or of Admiral Trotwood, moving in the best society of Dover. Cannot you see her, with a lot of bonny nieces of all ages, from Troublesome Ten to Sweet-and-Twenty, who come down to visit her in the summer, and who always may be seen on the pier of an afternoon, or listening to the band in the Granville Gardens, or may be found devouring tarts at Winter’s, in Snargate Street? I am sorry to find that I can obtain no assistance from boatmen or shopkeepers or fly-drivers. I have no guide or pilot of any description. I have simply to trust to mine own instinct, and to sail by the Dickens Chart — and if you sail by the Dickens Chart you cannot go very far wrong. If you read the text attentively you will almost invariably find he gives in the fewest possible words a complete indication of the locality he wishes to describe. It is so exactly and artfully done that if you are not careful as to a single word you may get on the wrong scent altogether.

You may remember the flyman — the only flyman who was civil and considerate to David — said, as he pointed towards the Heights, “If you go up there and keep right on till you come to some houses facing the sea, I think you’ll hear of her.” Now I followed these directions implicitly, but forgot David’s starting-point was not the marketplace itself but “a street corner, near the marketplace.” This made all the difference. However, I think I am on the right path, and I step out bravely. I am certainly going up hill, quite too much of a hill this lovely morning. It is evidently an ancient part of Dover; it is a narrow and a steep street, and the houses all look as if they were turning their backs on it. I am quite certain that I am on the right track, though I come to the conclusion the neighbourhood must have been considerably built upon since the days of Miss Trotwood. I note a quiet-looking, little, old-fashioned tavern, bearing the extraordinary sign, “The Cause is Altered.” I have a good mind to go in there and make inquiries. I wonder whether Miss Trotwood used to have her ale from this tavern, and if Mr. Dick ever sought relief from the labour of his Memorial in a glass of whisky and water, and a long churchwarden pipe, at this quiet little hostelry? No, I will not go in, because I think I see a house very much like the one I am in search of in the distance.

When I reach it I find it will not do at all. It breaks down at several points. It stands the wrong way; it is too pretentious; and the main characteristics of Miss Trotwood's dwelling-place are altogether wanting. I am very much afraid I have missed the mark altogether. I come upon a large cemetery on the slope of the hill. Though closed as a cemetery it is open as a garden, and I take a walk through it. I feel more than ever convinced that I have taken a wrong turn and am not in the right neighbourhood. For I am quite certain that Mr. Dick would have come here to meditate amid the tombs, and that Charles Dickens would have chronicled the fact. I take a turn round the well-kept graveyard, and think I espy in the distance a house that may possibly do. I walk along a pathway between comparatively modern cottages and the cemetery, where some ragged little girls, playing at hopscotch, regard me reproachfully. They evidently think I have no business to be walking about their playground. I pass by a market-garden. There is a little house on the edge of the slope, which looks as though it might slide off into Snargate Street at any moment, if the market-gardener happened to lean against it. It appears to be built of wood, with sham battlements. It is apparently of modern construction, and would certainly never have suited David Copperfield's aunt. I ascend the steps leading to the Heights. I pause halfway, for really the morning is so sunny that I feel quite exhausted.

The view hence is certainly superb. You have an excellent view of the Castle on your left, the town with its picturesque red roofs, and the film of blue smoke drifting across them. There is the valley of the Dour below, and immediately beneath me is Snargate Street, looking like a narrow alley. The colour, the beauty and variety of this scene will well repay me even if I fail to discover the object of my search. The whole scene is familiar to me, and I suddenly recollect that I have a very old print of Dover at home, that must have been taken from this very spot. This picture was taken long before Waterloo Crescent was built, and those houses certainly spoil the effect of the prospect from my present standpoint. I stay here gazing so long, and looking at the castle from different points of view, that I am afraid the sentry above regards me with suspicion, and half fancies I am making measurements or taking surreptitious sketches of the fortifications. Now it would be so very awkward if he were to ask me what I was doing there, and I were to reply, “ I was only looking for Miss Trotwood’s.” Supposing he were to deem this answer unsatisfactory, and arrested me, and eventually I had to explain matters before General Newdigate, I am inclined to think, “ Looking for Miss Trotwood’s” would be considered a very suspicious excuse. Two privates in the Royal Irish Rifles pass me and salute; the sentry has disappeared, so I trust confidence is restored.

I hark back by the cemetery; I take a sharp turn to the left, down a narrow street. It is a street that recalls, in a degree, the Rows of Great Yarmouth. The houses are small and ancient, but the inhabitants are evidently well to do; you see this in the plants in the windows, the brightly polished brass door knockers, and the sleek, well fed tabby cats basking in the sunshine. There are odd little shops that lurk in unexpected corners, quaint little courtyards in unaccountable places, and bright little gardens where you would least expect to see them. There was a curious little butcher’s shop — so clean, neat, and orderly, like a toy butcher’s shop — and it contained one of the largest butchers I ever saw. It seemed to take quite a firmament of blue calico to clothe him. He was a jovial, hearty butcher, too; it must be quite a pleasure to deal with him. I could not help wondering where he would store his Christmas joints, or how he could ever find room to cut up anything. He looks so pleasant that I have a great mind to go in and ask him about Miss Trotwood. He might, though, think I was poking fun at him. That would never do, for if he became irate and felt tempted to smite me with his cleaver, or prod me with his steel, I should probably be sorry I spoke.

Evidently they are accustomed to receive very few visitors in this part of Dover, for children stare at me and gossips stop in the middle of a most interesting conversation and gaze after me. I walk boldly on, pretending I know every inch of the way and each turn of the lane, but not deceiving the inhabitants in the least, and feeling at the same time that my swagger is altogether unsuccessful. I think they mistrust my eye-glass. I cannot help that. If I did not wear it I could not see they mistrusted it. Query, if I dropped my eye-glass would the mistrust be removed, or should I only fail to have knowledge of the mistrust? This is an elaborate question, and there is so much to be said on both sides, that I at once dismiss it from my consideration. Like all questions that have much to be said on both sides, it is not worth discussion. Besides, it would not help me to discover Miss Trotwood’s.

Here, though, is something that will, unless I am very much mistaken. Here is a curious little general shop, with swollen, rather than bow, windows of ancient glass. Behind the pane are mysterious bottles containing mysterious bull's-eyes. There are jars of pickles, packets of starch, balls of string, bundles of wood, lucifer matches, a sugarloaf in blue paper, fire-revivers, and biscuits. Inside, the shop is very dark, but I imagine, from the odour of coffee that is wafted from the door, the bag of split peas, and the bundles of birch brooms that lean against either doorpost, you could get anything there you please necessary for house, keeping in the neighbourhood I happen to be exploring. It is just such a shop as the one where David Copperfield saw Janet, whence she eventually took him to his aunt's. There is a young woman making purchases there at the present moment. The man behind the counter is smiling pleasantly and weighing something in the scales. I feel certain it must be Janet, and feel almost inclined to go in, call her by name, and ask her to direct me to the abode of her mistress. I am getting quite disheartened at my want of success. I pass the shop, I turn down a narrow passage to my right, and I come upon a road leading up to the Down on my left.

In the distance I see what I fancy must be the house. The nearer I approach it the better satisfied I am; and directly I am in front of it, I have no doubt whatever on the subject. It is perhaps not quite so neat as it was in Miss Betsey Trotwood's time; but there is no doubt that it is the house. There are the bow-windows, there is the room above where Mr. Dick alarmed poor little David by nodding and winking at him on his first arrival. The window to the right must have been the neat room with the drugget-covered carpet, and the old-fashioned brightly polished furniture where might be found "the cat, the kettle-holder, the two canaries, the old china, the punch-bowl full of dried rose-leaves, the tall press guarding all sorts of bottles and pots, and wonderfully out of keeping with the rest." The garden is evidently not so gay or so well cared for as it used to be, and though there were no donkey-boys about for Miss Trotwood to assault and batter, there were plenty of riotous, screeching school-children on whom she might have expended her superfluous energy with considerable satisfaction to herself and great benefit to the neighbourhood. That irrepressible nuisance — Buggins the Builder — cannot be controlled even in the neighbourhood of Dover, and hugely does he enjoy to mar those spots that have been hallowed by antiquity, by seclusion, or the pen of the novelist. Hence the abode of Betsy Trotwood is not so pleasant as it must have been formerly, for other houses have clustered about the back and the front.

The house, however, still stands high, the fresh breezes from over the sea and across the Down smite it. It still has a view of the sea, though perhaps not so uninterrupted as it was in the days of David Copperfield. I thought of that view as I looked up at the bow-window of the room, where the poor, tired, hungry, exhausted little fellow slept the first night of his arrival. Do you recollect him gazing on the moonlit sea after he was in bed? He says, "I remember the solemn feeling with which I at length turned my eyes away, yielded to the sensation of gratitude and rest which the sight of the white-curtained bed — and how much more the lying softly down upon it, nestling in the snow-white sheets — inspired. I remember how I thought of all the solitary places under the night sky where I had slept, and how I prayed that I never might be houseless any more, and never might forget the houseless. I remember how I seemed to float then, down the melancholy glory of that track upon the sea, away into the world of dreams."

With the melody of this prose poem ringing in my ears I take my way homewards, thinking how much we owe to the Master-hand who invested our every-day life with such an indescribable charm, and by his magic touch rendered commonplace neighbourhoods and ordinary bricks-and-mortar a joy as long as they shall exist.

DISAPPEARING DICKENSLAND

By Charles Dickens, Jr.

Among the vast number of queer businesses in which people somehow or other manage to pick up a decent livelihood in London there is one which is hardly known to Londoners themselves, and but little known even to visitors from other parts of England, but with which a great number of enthusiastic American travellers are pretty well acquainted. Indeed, it is not too much to say that it is almost entirely among the pilgrims to English literary shrines and the indefatigable and omnivorous general sightseers from the great Western Continent that the professors of this singular and deceptive industry find their prey.

For it must be owned at the outset that, although in the ordinary conduct of their lives these people are fairly honest, perhaps, as the world goes, there is something of a predatory nature in their public career, and that the flights of fancy in which their peculiar avocation compels them to indulge are occasionally — I might almost say generally — very near akin to downright mendacity. It may be pleaded in mitigation of this somewhat severe judgment that long intercourse and familiarity with works of fiction have developed among them more brilliant imaginations, a higher inventive faculty and keener eyes for the picturesque than are found in ordinary mortals; but the fact after all remains that more thorough-paced disciples of Ananias and Sapphira than the guides to what is called Dickensland in London it would be difficult to find in all that vast army of untrustworthy people who have taken the great sights and shrines of the world into their peculiar keeping.

As a matter of fact, the London of the early books of Charles Dickens is, practically, as Mrs. Curdle said of the drama, “gone, absolutely gone.” Very little even remains of most of the places described in the later works. Dickensland in London, indeed, has nowadays hardly any more real existence than the Garden of the Hesperides or the Island of Atlantis. But what does that matter? The transatlantic pilgrim to the shrine of the master clamors to be shown the house in which Mr. Pickwick lived, the court in which Mr. Krook made such a very uncomfortable end of it, the actual public-house which displayed Mr. Samuel Weller's extensive and peculiar knowledge of London in so remarkable a degree, the Old Curiosity Shop, Tom-all-alone's, the Wooden Midshipman and all the rest of it. Why should he not be gratified? It is true that a great many places of this kind were absolutely incapable of certain identification at any time, and that almost all the originals of those which were actually portraits have been swept from the face of the earth in the course of the extraordinary changes which have practically given us in fifty years a new London on the ruins of the old. But the demand inevitably creates the supply. Old illusions die hard. Dickensland lives again in the vivid imagination of the guides, and the truth of the old saying again asserts itself — populus vult decipi et decipitur. A curious instance of the way in which people are sometimes quite unconsciously and innocently led into error in these matters is to be found in John Forster's Life of Charles Dickens. Mr. Forster gives a picture of Tavistock House, which is, no doubt, accepted as a faithful representation of the house as it was when Charles Dickens lived in it. But, as a matter of fact, it is not. A later tenant added a portico, or porch, to the street door; and this portico, of which Charles Dickens knew nothing, figures in the picture. This is, perhaps, a trivial matter; but many of the Dickensland traditions have received credence on very similar, and equally inaccurate, grounds. Thus, for instance, to take a case outside London, local tradition at the little seaside village of Broadstairs in Kent has given the name Bleak House to the house on the cliff above the harbor, in which Charles Dickens lived during two or three summers, and which, in his time, was known as Fort House; and the legend — implicitly believed in those parts — is that Bleak House was written there. In point of fact, although much of Charles Dickens's work was done at Broadstairs — notably, as regards David Copperfield — it so happens that Bleak House was one of the books on which no work whatever was done in Fort House.

That there is really little or nothing left of what may fairly be called Dickensland in the London of to-day, a rapid survey of a few of the books which afford the guides their most popular and remunerative examples will amply prove.

The Sketches — to begin with the beginning — were written some fifty-seven years ago, and it is natural that the scenes described, and the manners and customs of the actors in them, should have changed considerably in so long a period. But how the whole thing has been actually swept away is nothing less than astonishing.

“A few years hence,” Charles Dickens wrote in the description of Scotland Yard, “and the antiquary of another generation, looking into some mouldy record of the strife and passion that agitated the world in these times, may glance his eye over the pages we have just filled ; and not all his knowledge of the history of the past, not all his black-letter lore, or his skill in book collecting, not all the dry studies of a long life, or the dusty volumes that have cost him a fortune may help him to the whereabouts either of Scotland Yard or of any of the landmarks we have mentioned in describing it.” This prediction has been amply and speedily verified. Scotland Yard still exists, it is true, but the street of handsome buildings which leads from Whitehall to Northumberland Avenue has nothing but the name in common with the old world “territory, which was first accidentally discovered by a country gentleman who lost his way in the Strand,” and the “landmarks” have fared as badly. Northumberland House has gone altogether, and its site is occupied by the Grand Hotel and the northern end of Northumberland Avenue; the new market, the springing up of which at Hungerford is described as having first given the signal of change in Scotland Yard, itself made way for Charing Cross Railway Station in 1862; the Hungerford Suspension Bridge, which was not constructed until nine years after the date of the Sketches, was transported to Clifton near Bristol, at the same time. Absolutely no trace of the old place remains.

Following the Sketches in order, we find Seven Dials still existing, little altered in their main features but still considerably improved ; but the famous old clothes shops of Monmouth Street have gone the way of most of the frowsy slums of a like nature. Except as to the entrance from St. Paul’s Churchyard and what is called Dean’s Court, where some of the old buildings have been preserved, the same fate has attended Doctors Commons, the courts, so familiar to us through David Copperfield, were destroyed in 1867; the successors of Mr. Spenlow and the “coves in white aprons,” to whom the elder Mr. Weller fell so easy a prey, have vanished together into space. There is still a theatre on the site of Astley’s, but it is not the same as that in which Christopher Nubbles and his family and friends made such delightful holiday — nor, it may be incidentally mentioned, would it be possible for any gentleman in Kit’s position to give that remarkable oyster supper nowadays for the simple reason that the price of oysters in London has increased in direct proportion to the increase of London itself.

Londoners get so many holidays in these days — and use them so much better than was too often the case in the old time — that they no longer require “a periodical breaking out. ... A sort of spring rash; a three days’ fever which cools the blood for six months afterwards, and at the expiration of which London is restored to its old habits of plodding industry as suddenly and completely as if nothing had ever happened to disturb them,” to quote the Sketches’ description of Greenwich Fair, and it is perhaps fortunate that this should be so, for Greenwich Fair was abolished as a crying nuisance many years ago. A more permanent, and, in its way, more respectable form of outdoor recreation, practically vanished when the public got tired of Vauxhall — celebrated by Thackeray both in Vanity Fair and Pendennis — and the “Royal Property,” as it was called, was parcelled out into building lots, and when its sometime rival, Cremorne, which, oddly enough, is not mentioned by Charles Dickens, was also swallowed up by the advance of the enterprising London builder in the course of the sixties. The ill-contrived, ill-arranged, ill-constructed criminal courts at the Old Bailey still remain, as crying a disgrace to the greatest and wealthiest city in the world as ever. The prison of Newgate is not yet pulled down, but is practically disused and is to disappear into the limbo of London memories before very long, and, though it is still used as a place of execution, the miserable business is now done privately instead of in the presence of the horrible crowd which used to fill the open space before the frowning walls on “hanging Mondays” in the bad old time. The Samuel Wilkins of to-day could not take Miss Jemima Evans to the “Eagle,” for that place of amusement — afterwards, in the hands of John Rouse, and, later, of the two Conquests, father and son, famous as the “Grecian theatre” — has passed into the hands of the Salvation Army, and its concerts nowadays are provided only by the singularly inharmonious brazen instruments and flabby big drums in which the followers of General Booth appear to take so weird a delight, while the dancing platform in the garden, if it is used at all, must needs be utilized exclusively for the corybantic exercises of tambourine-pointing Hallelujah Lasses and Happy Elizas. As for the “White Conduit,” where Miss Amelia Martin realized all the bitterness of ill-considered and disappointed ambition, its place knew it no more, and its site in Pentonville was built over, years ago.

It will be noticed that almost every place of amusement mentioned in the Sketches has disappeared entirely, and even a casual observer cannot fail to see that the amusements of the great mass of the London people have at the same time changed altogether. The Vauxhalls and Cremornes have gone, and, even if they had survived for a few years longer, would inevitably have been suppressed by the wisdom of our municipal rulers, who have decided that public dancing-places shall be tabooed, and would like, if they could, to refuse any refreshment but tea and lemonade to the visitors to the Crystal Palaces and Earl's Courts which have taken the place of the old pleasure resorts. To some extent the change may be and, I suppose, must be admitted to be for the better, but that the people of that day enjoyed themselves in simpler fashion than we do, and were content with a great deal less in the way of amusement — and spent very much less money in the process — than is demanded now must be patent to any reader of the Sketches. The monstrous growth of London and the enormously increased facilities for moving about, which have of late years been provided by railways, omnibuses, and trams, have made it almost impossible for the modern Londoner to take his pleasure, such as it is, except in droves and mobs, and I doubt very much whether our people really get half as much enjoyment for their money as their simpler-minded and more easy-going ancestors got out of their cheaper and far less frequent holidays and diversions.

The troubles of the Pickwickian explorer of Dickensland in London begin very early in his career, and the aspect of Goswell Street, now known as Goswell Road, which will meet him on the very threshold, is calculated to inflict upon him a severe shock to his feelings. It is difficult to imagine how a gentleman of means, such as Mr. Pickwick is described to have been, could ever have taken up his abode in this noisy, bustling, and, if the truth must be told, decidedly unpleasant thoroughfare, or how Sergeant Buzfuz, even in the loftiest and most poetical flights of his eloquence, could ever have associated it with anything in the nature of tranquillity and retirement. And, even bearing in mind the fact that Mrs. Bardell's establishment was of a very modest kind, it would certainly require the boldest and most determined of guides to pitch upon any house in the Goswell Road as that from which Mr. Pickwick emerged on the memorable "thirteenth of May, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven.” But the look of the thing changes when it is remembered that at that time Islington, which lies at the northern extremity of the Goswell Road, was a pleasant, outlying village; that the fields and lanes of Pentonville, Stoke Newington, Highbury, Hornsey, and Highgate were within an easy walk of Mr. Pickwick’s lodging, and that the miles and miles of streets which now separate the Goswell Road from the open country were not even thought of.

Possibly, as our traveller drives disappointed to the Golden Cross, he will wonder how ever Mr. Pickwick managed to have that instructive conversation with the cabman, which would under present arrangements be quite impossible, until he remembers that in those days the cabman sat on a kind of perch just outside the cab and handy for conversation with the fare, and recognizes, as he probably will, the infinite superiority of the modern hansom over the ancient “cabriolet;” while it will afford him food for reflection to consider that the prototype of the crowd of omnibuses through which he threads his way did not make its appearance in the streets of London until the 4th of July, 1829 — just about the time, indeed, that Mr. Pickwick had completed the sowing of his rather late crop of wild oats and had settled down at Dulwich.

As to the Golden Cross, that is only represented to-day by a comparatively modern hotel opposite Charing Cross station. The old Golden Cross was cleared away in 1829 or 1830 to make room for the present Trafalgar Square, which has itself been transmogrified in the course of time to such an extent that anybody who has to revisit it now after an absence of five and twenty years or so would scarcely recognize the place but for the Nelson Column, the National Gallery, and St. Martin’s Church.

Up to about six years ago there was still enough left of the old White Hart Inn in the Borough to swear by, for, although the buildings on the south side of the yard had been replaced by an exceedingly modern public-house, some of the old galleries and tiled roofs on the north and east still looked down forlornly on the pilgrim. Now there is not even that much consolation left. The whole place has been swept away, and is as unrecognizable as the “Belle Sauvage” on Ludgate Hill, the Pickwickian associations with which were long ago dissipated by the erection of a great printing office on the site of the house at which Mr. Weller, Senior, stopped “ven he drove up,” and which has only left its name as a puzzle to antiquaries. But if the White Hart is gone, a few doors farther to the southward there yet lingers a considerable portion of one of those typical old taverns, “The George “ by name, and any one who wishes to know just what the extinct White Hart was like would do well to pay a visit to this quaint old hostelry. The yard has been annexed by a railway company as a depot for the receipt of goods, but all that part of the house which lies to the south is in admirable preservation, and “The George,” although not the rose itself, is at all events nearly next door to it.

The dry arches of Waterloo Bridge, which were so highly eulogized by Mr. Samuel Weller as a “fine sleeping plane — within ten minutes walk of all the public offices — only if there is an objection to it it is that the situation is rayther too airy,” still exist, it is true, but as they were utilized for warehouses, stables, and so on shortly after Mr. Weller s time they do not now offer any points of interest to the explorer, and the “Fox-under-the-Hill” tavern in the immediate neighborhood — where Mr. Roker’s friend Teddy Martin “whopped the coalheaver “ — was disestablished by the Victoria Embankment, and the last traces of it have been swept away by the vast alterations now going on between the Strand and the Embankment at the foot of Cecil and Salisbury streets.

It is of no use for the Dickens student to allow his guide to take him into the city in search of Messrs. Dodson & Fogg’s offices in Freeman’s Court, — they were pulled down four and thirty years ago: and I should very much doubt his succeeding in the discovery of that “ second court on the right hand side — last house on the same side of the vay,” the close acquaintance with which, extending even to an intimate familiarity with the peculiarities of the “box as stands in the first fire-place,” stamped Mr. Weller’s knowledge of London as being extensive and peculiar. It was about six or seven and thirty years ago that I first began my quest after that box in the first fire-place, and as I have never been able to come across it I presume it must have been improved off the face of the earth very soon after Mr. Weller’s time.

There is a George Yard off Lombard Street to this day, but it is a very different George Yard to that in which the George and Vulture was situated — Mr. Pickwick surely had odd tastes in the way of lodging — and the site of the hotel is now occupied by a part of the City Conservative Club, all that remains of the old place being its name on the door post of an adjoining chop house. The Blue Boar in Leadenhall Market, where they were so well acquainted with the elder Mr. Weller’s ways, fared as badly when the narrow congeries of ramshackle lanes and alleys, which until quite recently contained the old market, were wiped out by the fine buildings of the present one. Hard by, the little timber midshipman — ” that which might be called, familiarly, the woodenest, that which thrust itself out above the pavement, right leg foremost, with a suavity the least endurable, and had the shoe buckles and flapped waistcoat the least reconcilable to human reason, and bore at its right eye the most offensively disproportionate piece of machinery “ — no longer stands “ taking observations of the hackney coaches “ from the side of Sol Gills’s door in Leadenhall Street; and the street itself and all the buildings in it are changed beyond recognition. There is no room any more in Bevis Marks for Mr. Sampson Brass’s residence, the parlor window of which was so close upon the footway that the passenger who took the wall brushed the dim glass with his coat sleeve. Bevis Marks is now a fairly broad street of warehouses and other well-to-do places of business, and one would as soon expect to see a giraffe in “The Marks” as a Punch and Judy show. Further to the southward again people walk about in Todgers’s neighborhood — or what would be Todgers’s neighborhood if Todgers’s still existed — as easily as they walk about anywhere else. It is no longer the fate of the pedestrian in this quarter to “grope his way for an hour through lanes and by-ways, and court-yards and passages,” and never once to emerge “upon anything that might be reasonably called a street.” Lanes and by-ways, court-yards and passages, all the “devious mazes “ of the district have been carted away, and nothing remains but the monument, now the centre of quite a respectable open space, to remind us that M. Todgers once kept house and wrestled with the commercial gentlemen’s appetite for gravy close by; while it is enough to give one look only at Cannon Street to feel that it is no longer the place for the “somewhat similar” establishment to which Mr. Jinkins took occasion to refer after a certain memorable dinner at which Todgers’s showed what it could do when it tried.

A very happy hunting-ground for the sojourner in Dickensland in London used to be the unsavory neighborhood “in the vicinity of Clare Market and closely approximating to the back of New Inn,” wherein was situated the Magpie and Stump Tavern, in which Mr. Lowton entertained Mr. Pickwick in so singular a manner, and I take it that more impossible guesses and audacious taradiddles have been gravely offered to the unsuspecting traveller in this particular portion of Dickensland than in any other. For not only did the shabby, dirty, noisome courts and alleys of which these particular slums were composed — and almost all of which have been quite recently pulled down — answer to many of Charles Dickens's descriptions of low neighborhoods; not only were there here many taverns which might well have stood for the “Magpie and Stump” — I think, indeed, that the weather-beaten sign-board “bearing “the half obliterated semblance of a magpie intently eyeing a crooked streak of brown paint which the neighbors had been taught from infancy to consider as the stump” really was still in existence up to a comparatively recent date; but just round the corner, as it were, where Portsmouth Street joins Lincoln's Inn Fields, is the choicest and most generally believed in of all the bogus Dickens sights. This is a mean little building, now used as a waste-paper store, which describes itself as the veritable Old Curiosity Shop “immortalized by Charles Dickens,” and which has about as much to do with the genuine building — if Nell's home had any actual brick and mortar original — as the Capitol in Washington itself. Curiosity shops were not such rarities in 1840 that it was important to take any particular specimen as a model to begin with, but let anybody recall the descriptions of the Old Curiosity Shop itself in the earlier chapters of the book, carefully consider Cattermole's illustrations, and then take stock of that claimant to the title which is now under consideration, and I think he will have as little hesitation in arriving at the conclusion that the Portsmouth Street building is a complete fraud as I have myself. There is a description of a “small, dull yard” below the old man's window, for one thing, which puts the whole matter beyond doubt, seeing that the very few windows in the house in Portsmouth Street look direct into the roadway; while the statement in the book that the “back parlour was very far removed from the old man's chamber,” and the consideration of the circumstances that there were in the Curiosity Shop of the book two rooms on the ground floor besides the shop, and that in the Portsmouth Street house there could not be any possibility of finding room for a tenth part of the grandfather's stock-in-trade, seem to knock the final nails into the coffin of Portsmouth Street. And if any further evidence is considered necessary it will be found, I think, in the description of the deserted house as “a dull barrier dividing the glaring lights and bustle of the streets into two long lines.” There are not many glaring lights and not much bustle in Portsmouth Street, and if there were, they could not, by any stretch of the imagination, make “two long lines.”

Not very far off, across Lincoln's Inn Fields and New Square, Lincoln's Inn, is an undoubtedly genuine bit of Dickensland, however; not long to remain it may be feared, as a great deal of pulling down and rebuilding are going on in the neighborhood, but well worth looking at while it lasts. This is the court in which Mr. Krook lived. It can be approached either by the little gate about midway in the east side of New Square, through which Miss Flite conducted "The Wards in Jarndyce," or by a passage adjoining the Three Tuns public-house in Chancery Lane, just opposite Bream's Buildings. It is known to ordinary mortals as Chichester Rents, and at the Lincoln's Inn end of it stands the Old Ship Tavern, which, I have no doubt whatever, was the original of the Sol's Arms. A careful and interesting article in the St. James's Gazette of June 27, 1892, claims the corner house opposite (Nos. 8 and 9) as Mr. Krook's, and relies for evidence especially on the fact that no other house in the court has an attic with an outside parapet — "Lady Jane," the Lord Chancellor's cat crouched "on the parapet outside for hours and hours" seeking to devour Miss Flite's birds, it will be remembered. But against that is to be set in strict fairness the fact that we have it in Mr. Krook's own words that the Sol's Arms was "next door," while the coroner in the course of the inquest on Mr. Krook himself speaks of the "unlucky house next door;" and we are therefore compelled to conclude that "over the way" and "next door" were interchangeable terms both with Mr. Krook and the coroner, or to admit that it is absurd in considering such matters as this to insist on an absolute photographic accuracy in matters of detail. It is enough — or ought to be enough, of course it is not enough for the genuine enthusiast — that a place should bear sufficient resemblance to a description in one of the books to enable us to say with tolerable certainty, this is the scene which suggested so and so to the writer. To insist upon every brick, or on the absolute identification of every detail; to suppose that Charles Dickens held himself down in such cases to mere literal description, bringing to it no imagination or invention of his own, is manifestly absurd. And it seems to me that a judgment based on these considerations will be in favor of Chichester Rents, just as it will not admit the claims of the Old Curiosity Shop in Portsmouth Street. Chichester Rents has a rival claimant, by the bye, in Bishop's Court, a little to the northward. But what little remains — and it is not much — of the old houses in Bishop's Court only seems to point to the greater authenticity of "The Rents."

The particular Bleak House scenes associated with this neighborhood, it may be added, are very easily to be identified. There is no difficulty in recognizing Took's Court, Cursitor Street, as Mr. Snagsby's Cook's Court, for instance, and as yet the march of improvement has left there many houses, any one of which may well be that over which the "little woman" ruled with so iron a rod. The Courts of Chancery have been cleared away and their business has been transferred to the great legal palace in the Strand — that triumph of ill-arrangement and inconvenience which might almost be the work of the Court of Chancery itself — but the original of Mr. Tulkinghorn's chambers would not be hard to find somewhere about No. 58 Lincoln's Inn Fields; while farther west, half-way down Russell Court, which leads from Drury Lane to Catherine Street, are the "reeking little tunnel of a court," the steps which Jo swept so carefully and so cleanly because "he was so wery good to me, he was," and the "beastly scrap of ground" in which they buried Captain Hawdon. There is no offence about the little tunnel of a court now, the burying-ground has been asphalted over and is a playground for children, but that the little churchyard out of Russell Court was that which Charles Dickens had in his mind when he selected a last resting-place for poor "Nemo" cannot, I think, reasonably be doubted. As for Tom-all-Alone's, better supervision, sanitary and police — and especially the passing of Lord Shaftesbury's Common Lodging-Houses Act in 1851 — have cut Tom's claws and generally trimmed him up a good deal, but there are still many courts and alleys between Catherine Street and Lincoln's Inn Fields which would be unsafe enough in the daytime, and absolutely dangerous at night, for well-dressed people, not being doctors, nurses, sisters of charity, or scripture readers. Across Holborn, to the northward, Kingsgate Street still lingers precariously. Before long, no doubt, it will take the prevailing infection from the broad, new street at its northern end and burst out into that peculiar modern red brick which, like a sort of scarlet-building-fever, has seized upon so much of the neighborhood, but a fairly lively imagination can still make out Mrs. Gamp's first floor, which was so "easily assailable at night by pebbles, walking-sticks, and fragments of tobacco pipe" — although the modern successor of Mr. Sweedlepipe calls his shop a hairdressing saloon, and appears to have no connection in the bird line.

But I have wandered from the party at the Magpie and Stump and from Jack Bamber, whose stories about the old inns dealt with places of which

Charles Dickens was very fond, and which are described in many of his books. Several of these will well repay a visit from the careful and enthusiastic Dickens student, for those which still survive have changed but little in the last fifty years. The Temple has been altered a great deal, it is true, but Fountain Court has been left pretty much as it was when it served as a place of meeting for Tom Pinch and Ruth, and many other of the Dickens scenes which are laid in the Temple can still be easily identified in the course of a stroll among the old buildings which still remain. Furniss's Inn is still very much as it was when John Westlock had that charming little dinner party there; a memorial tablet marks the house in which Charles Dickens wrote the greater part of Pickwick; there has been little or no change in Gray's Inn, since Traddles took the "dearest girl in the world" there after their marriage; Staple Inn and Barnard's Inn — the latter the dingiest collection of shabby buildings ever squeezed together in a rank corner as a club for tomcats — still real memories of Mr. Grewgious, Neville Landless, and Mr. Tartar, Pip, Herbert Pocket and Joe Gargery; while Clifford's Inn remains the dreariest of all the "shabby crew," as Charles Dickens called them. The extensive opening up which has been effected by the construction of Holborn Circus and the new streets in its vicinity has brought Thaives Inn out of its native obscurity; the archway through which Mr. Guppy conducted Esther Summerson to Mr. Jellyby's house has been removed, and the Inn is now one of the turnings out of the broad Circus itself. But it is still easily recognizable in bad weather as "a narrow street of high houses, like an oblong cistern to hold the fog," and has a curiously old-fashioned air among its brand new modern surroundings. Indeed, few of the localities in Dickensland in London answer more satisfactorily to the description than Thaives Inn. But a little way across the Circus are the splendid markets of Smithfield on the site of that disgraceful old cattle-market which seemed to Pip "all a-smear with filth, and fat, and blood, and foam," and which presented so desolate an appearance to Oliver Twist when he started on that terrible journey to Chertsey with Mr. Sikes. All the Oliver Twist district about here, it may be added, has disappeared as completely as Jacob's Island itself, not even a Holborn Hill or a Snow Hill — now connected by the Viaduct — remaining to serve as landmarks. Clement's Inn is being pulled down; New Inn is threatened with a like fate; the Globe and the Opera Comique Theatres occupy the site of Lyon's Inn; the place of Symond's Inn, where Mr. Vholes had his office, and where Richard Carstone lived after the Court of Chancery had cast its evil spell over him, knows it no more.

The Marshalsea Prison, which figured so conspicuously in one of Jack Bamber's stories, which reappeared still more prominently in Little Dorrit, and to the recollection of which the many sad incidents of Charles Dickens's boyhood give so much painful interest, has altogether gone. Some of its ruins were still standing in 1856, but no trace of it is now to be found, although local tradition — unaccompanied by any sort of proof — has it that some portions of the old prison still exist among the houses to the northward of St. George's Church, in the Borough High Street. The Fleet prison was also pulled down long ago, and its site on the east side of the south end of Farringdon Street built over. With the debtors' prisons, and imprisonment for debt itself, have gone all the sponging houses about Cursitor Street — the Coavinses and others — and that mysterious institution known as the "Rules of the Bench," the memory of which has been preserved for us in "Nicholas Nickleby."

But it is not only individual houses belonging to Dickensland which have been lost to us in process of time. Whole neighborhoods have changed their nature; new and handsome quarters of the town have arisen, not only since the days of Mr. Pickwick, but since the death, only twenty-two years ago, of his creator himself. Trafalgar Square, as we have seen, dates only from about the close of Mr. Pickwick's career; the great work of the Victoria Embankment was not completed until 1870; the Northumberland Avenue change was of later date still. The Royal Exchange and the open space about it did not exist before 1844. The widening of the Poultry and Newgate street, the construction of the Holborn Viaduct, and the clearing away of Middle Row, Holborn, have made a fine thoroughfare which Mr. Pickwick would be quite unable to recognize as that along which he walked with Sam Weller from George Yard to Gray's Inn. Farringdon Street, Ludgate Circus, St. Bride Street, and New Bridge Street have completely changed all that neighborhood. The city has been absolutely transformed by the opening up of fine new streets in every direction. Shaftesbury Avenue, Theobald's Road, Rosebery Avenue, Victoria Street, the great market of Smithfield, and many other new streets and open spaces have made havoc of the networks of slums, the narrow thoroughfares and the intricate mazes of houses which people in the old days seemed to regard with perfect complacency. The Houses of Parliament, the Courts of Justice, and almost all of the theatres have been built, and half the parks of London have been made — not to mention the extension of the railway system — not only since Mr. Pickwick's time, but even in quite recent years.

It is needless to multiply instances. It is enough to recognize the fact that the greater part of the London of fifty years ago has vanished already, and that the requirements of a vastly increased and more exacting population demand still further and more sweeping changes. We shall be fortunate if we can even save some of the great monuments of architectural art which were bequeathed to us by our forefathers ; but as to Dickensland in London, that in the course of a very few years will exist only in the books themselves and in the notes of explorers and commentators.

ROUND ABOUT DOTHEBOY'S HALL

From: Temple Bar, April 1889, p.507-513

By H.F.A.

“And at about six o’clock that night he and Mr. Squeers and the little boys and their united luggage were put down at the George and New Inn.”

So reads the ardent pilgrim who, after a beautiful walk from Barnard Castle by the wooded banks of Tees, and the stately demesne of Rokeby, finds himself leaning against the balustrade of the Greta Bridge, fired with a fresh perusal of ‘Nicholas Nickleby,’ and bent on a pilgrimage in the footsteps of the great novelist.

But where is the George and New Inn?

Watling Street, or, to speak more correctly, a branch of Watling Street, called the Maiden Way, runs right and left, coming up from the South in a nearly straight line from Catterick Bridge, and proceeding westward by way of Bowes and Brough. There is not a human being in sight, and the only sound which breaks the stillness is the musical roar of Greta dashing over its rocky bed through the picturesque scenery of Rokeby Park on its way to join the Tees. But the pilgrim sees no George and New Inn, is unwilling to believe that the new-fangled Morritt Arms which he has just passed can be an old friend with a new face, and is beginning to feel a disappointment as great as he felt when he turned down Snow Hill before proceeding northwards to see the old Saracen’s Head, when his attention is attracted by a large, rambling old house with a long range of stables and coach-houses, which he instinctively divines must have been at one time an inn.

A chance native coming upon the scene confirms his opinion, and tells him that this was the identical Inn at which the party from the Saracen’s Head alighted, and whence they started for Dotheboys Hall in the rusty pony-chaise and cart. Being an unusually intelligent native, he adds that the pleasant country house about half-a-mile down the road in a southerly direction, now known as Thorpe Grange, was originally, before the introduction of railways, built as an inn, and called the New Inn; which not only rivalled its elder brother by the bridge side, but took away its custom, so that its present owner claims for it the distinction of being the original hostelry celebrated by Charles Dickens. Our solution is that the novelist, not to be invidious, combined the titles of the two inns; and we may proceed with the rusty pony-chaise and cart along the old Roman road to Bowes, where is situated the immortal Dotheboys Hall.

In the brightest of weather it is a sad, desolate old road, so that we can readily realise the chill which struck upon poor Nicholas as he drove along it that bitter, snowy night — a straight road, dwindling in some places to the proportions of a mere grass-grown cart track, running on a high bank, according to the invariable old Roman fashion, through a sparsely-inhabited, quarry-dotted country. And an appropriate termination to so sad and desolate a highway is the first aspect of the village of Bowes.

The first house in Bowes — that grim, square building to the right, now known as Bowes Hall — was one of the Yorkshire schools crushed by the publication of ‘Nicholas Nickleby,’ and is moreover famous as having been for some time the residence of Richard Cobden. To the left goes the road to Gilmonby; from the right, by the railway station, comes another Roman road from Barnard Castle; and in front stretches battered, decayed, deserted, Pompeii-like Bowes. Geese straddle over the uneven grass-grown footpaths; a savage dog growls and slinks away at our approach; a few women and children peer curiously at us from the patched-up windows of tumbledown cottages; a native giant, swinging along with a pitchfork on his shoulder, pauses to have a look at us — otherwise Bowes seems to be a village of the dead.

But a hearty welcome is given us by the genial clergyman, who frankly tells us that a visitor from the metropolitan world — some one who has ideas above cattle and crops — comes like a ray of sunshine on a November day; and he directs us to Dotheboys Hall.

A word of advice here to intending pilgrims. Do not allude to Charles Dickens or to Squeers’ School, except in the presence of those whom you know to be above common prejudices and animosities. These subjects may be said, to use an expression more forcible than elegant, to stink in the nostrils of your true Bowes man. He believes that the village owes its decay entirely to the abolition of Yorkshire schools in general, and of Dotheboys

Hall in particular. He points to the fact that whereas half a century ago Bowes had close upon two thousand inhabitants, it has now short of four hundred. He has never read 'Nicholas Nickleby,' nor would he if a copy could be found in the place. If you question him about the school, he will either tell you flatly that he knows nothing about it, or will evasively refer you to other places infamous from their schools. If you mention the name of Dickens he will flush up and relate with glee the popular story that the great novelist, upon the occasion of a subsequent visit to Bowes, was pumped on and thrashed by the infuriated inhabitants. Of course all Bowes folk do not share these prejudices, as we shall afterwards see; but the broad fact remains that Bowes, which was ruined in common with many hundreds of country-places standing on our great roads elsewhere by the withdrawal of the stage-coaches, must be humoured if the visitor hopes to reap any profit from his exploration.

We pass by a grand old inn, once known as the George, now the Unicorn, whereat eight coaches changed horses daily on their road between London and Scotland — a typical inn of the old sort, with labyrinths of rooms, a huge kitchen, a large courtyard, and acres of outhouses — and, with the little Norman church and the grim keep of the old Norman Castle on our left, push on to Dotheboys Hall, which is the last house in the village.

"A long, cold-looking house, one storey high, with a few straggling outbuildings behind, and a barn and stable adjoining." So we read. The house itself is unaltered, save that it is now decidedly the pleasantest and most cheerful-looking dwelling in the village, with its creeper-embowered windows looking on to a trim and well-kept garden. The stable and barn too remain; but the outbuildings, in which was comprised the school-house proper — the scene of the merciless thrashings, the starvation, the breaking of young hearts, the wrecking of young lives, the revolting misery and the bloodstirring barbarity — they have long disappeared.

A woman's face looks out from a lower window, and we are about to turn in at the front gate, but our guide stops us, saying —

"Not that way! No admittance there. You would be asked if you wanted to buy the house, and have the door slammed in your face."

So we follow the path, and turn in through the barn door. This leads us into a yard, where still stands the identical pump which, it may be remembered, Mr. Squeers discovered to be frozen on the morning after the long coach-ride from London.

From here we enter the kitchen — cautiously and silently, for the servant tells us that if her master discovered us we should assuredly be turned out with ignominy. There is nothing remarkable in the kitchen — a large, low, heavily-raftered apartment; nor in the little room leading from it, which was the schoolmaster's study; but we linger a long while as we gaze at the marks on the wall by the modern cooking-range, where stood the coppers wherein were boiled the potatoes which formed a principal part of the "young noblemen's" food; and as we peer through the study window, which the boys were set to clean when they had satisfactorily spelt "w-i-n-d-e-r, winder," on to the garden, whither they were despatched to hoe and rake on the attainment of the word "bottiney," we ask if a great number of people do not come here bound upon the same errand as ourselves. The reply is that a great many come; but that as they go to the front door they do not get in at all, but have to content themselves with an exterior view of Dotheboys Hall, so that we may deem ourselves lucky to have seen even the little we have.

So much for Dotheboys Hall itself. Still more interesting is the information we managed to pick up from various sources concerning Squeers and his School.

All our informants — country clergymen, intelligent residents, "oldest inhabitants," and such natives as did not feel themselves in honour bound to keep their mouths shut — agreed on one point: that the system of Yorkshire schools was monstrous and iniquitous to an incredible extent; that frightful cruelties were practised upon the boys — who were chiefly the illegitimate offspring of London parents — but that the school typified by Charles Dickens was the only one to which he could gain access, and was the best of the lot. There were two other schools at Bowes, one at Gilmonby, one at Cotherstone, and one at Barnard Castle; and the proprietors of these, suspecting the presence of a famous literary Londoner amongst them, refused him admittance; but at Shaw's he was made welcome, and shown over the premises.

But in other respects the evidence was so conflicting that we must simply give it without pronouncing any opinion on its value or the reverse. For instance, one woman, a native of Bowes, whose sympathies one would naturally imagine to be with the maligned Squeers, told us that she distinctly remembered the boys coming in summertime to her father's fields to help get in the hay, goaded to the work of horses by ushers armed with whips. On the other hand a gentleman whose father, being a schoolmaster, used to go up to the Saracen's Head with and on the same errand as Squeers, declared that the one-eyed schoolmaster was an estimable man, who cared for his pupils properly, and was generally respected and liked. He further stated that his father related to him how he happened to be at the Saracen's Head with Squeers after the Dotheboys Hall numbers of 'Nicholas Nickleby' had taken the public by storm; that the crowd literally besieged the inn, with the intention of lynching Squeers; that the commotion had such an effect upon the schoolmaster as to deprive him of reason, and that Mrs. Squeers died of a broken heart.

Another gentleman — once in holy orders — told us that he was at Bowes Grammar School contemporaneously with the existence of Shaw's School, that Shaw was known as the "King of the Road," because every half-year he hired a special coach to bring his pupils from London, and that the arrival of this coach at Bowes was the occasion of universal excitement and enthusiasm. He furthermore cited, as a proof that Shaw was maligned as to his treatment of his pupils, that great rivalry always existed between the Grammar School boys and those of Dotheboys Hall; that they played tremendous football matches together; and that every Easter Sunday it was a custom to appear in new suits and to pelt each other with Easter eggs. A fourth informant told us that the deaths at Shaw's School were frequent, that a large proportion of the boys were maimed by ill-usage, and that the neighbouring cottagers were continually giving shelter to runaways. A fifth spoke of the prototype of Fanny Squeers as a woman universally beloved and respected, who did infinite good among the poor and sick of the parish.

All however spoke of Shaw as a man subject to fits of violent passion, and admitted that he was addicted to using the cane unmercifully when under these influences.

In other instances, when we ventured to propound questions to more illiterate folk, we found that without committing themselves to giving any definite opinion, they tried to evade the questions, and thereby tacitly admitted that there was a great deal more truth in what Dickens had written than their local patriotism allowed them to express.

The graves of "Squeers," his wife, of "Fanny Squeers," and of young "Wackford," who died at the age of twenty-four, are to be seen in Bowes Churchyard. The late assistant station-master at Barnard Castle, Mackay by name, was said to be a son of the original of Nicholas Nickleby. John Browdie was one John Todd of Barningham, and died not very long ago; and the original of poor Smike is said to have died during the year 1885, aged seventy-four.

When we add that the “original” bowl and ladle with which Mrs. Squeers used to dispense brimstone and treacle to the boys were sold a short time back for ten pounds, and that many of Squeers’s old pupils have done very well in life, and frequently come to revisit the old house at Bowes, we exhaust the information we were able to collect concerning Mr. Squeers and Dotheboys Hall.

There is much else that makes a visit to Bowes an interesting excursion. The little Norman Church, put into excellent order and well cared for by the present clergyman, Mr. Wardale, contains some curious old Saxon relics: and indeed there is a strong Saxon local colour all about this neighbourhood, as we may see in such names as Thorsgill, Wodenscroft, Baldersdale, and Romaldskirk. Under the west window of the Church, outside the wall, is a tablet erected to the memory of Roger Wrightson and Martha Bailton, better known as the Edwin and Emma of Mallet’s beautiful and pathetic ballad. Mr. Wardale told us that on Sundays it is quite amusing to note the number of rustic sweethearting couples who throng to this spot to vow love as true and lasting as was that of Edwin and Emma.

A curious stone in a cottage garden attracts the visitor’s notice and becomes interesting when he is told that where it now stands was once Bowes market-place, and that during a long bygone period of pestilence the people from untainted districts brought their dairy produce and placed it on this stone, retiring to some distance whilst purchasers from infected places took the goods away, placing the payment in a basin of water.

Of old Bowes Castle only the keep remains; but, mere shell as it is, the masonry is superb, being in places eleven feet thick, and in the days of catapults and archery must have made Bowes an awkward nut to crack.

Behind the Castle and Church are the intrenchments which mark the site of the important Roman station of Lavatrae, connected with Cataractum or Catterick Bridge on the one side by the camp behind the Morritt Arms Inn at Greta Bridge, and with Verterae or Brough on the other by the earthworks at Spital. Here are the remains of the ubiquitous Boman bath, this one built by Valerius Fronto in A.d. 202; of an aqueduct connected with the Tees, which foams far below; and if funds were forthcoming doubtless other most interesting “finds” would be brought to light, although the site has been ransacked at a remote period.

There are probably few more utterly silent and desolate highways in Britain than this sturdy old Roman road upon which Bowes stands; but a six-mile tramp along it in a westerly direction is interesting. The road runs as it was laid down two thousand years ago, on a high-raised bank built up of the stone which abounds in this country; and on either side stretches a wild, picturesque moorland district, famous for its game, and with which are associated innumerable weird legends and traditions. At five miles distance is a large solitary old house standing amidst the only trees in the district, known as Old Spital, once a changing house for the coaches, and famous as being the scene of a dark tragedy related under the title of “The Hand of Glory.”

Beyond this house the scenery if possible grows more wild and desolate, and the pedestrian may on a winter’s day walk for miles along the old road without hearing any sound but the “cluck, cluck” of the partridges and the detonation of the breechloader, and without seeing a human being but a stray beater stirring the birds to flight by waving a flag.

Beyond a lonely turnpike, long disused, the road rises until it gains the summit of Stanemoor. Here, amidst intrenchments of some grandeur, stands in a trough a stone, known as the Rey Roy or Rere Cross, once the boundary between the kingdoms, of England and Scotland, now marking the border of Yorkshire and Westmoreland — and alluded to by Scott in ‘Rokeby,’ —

“And the best of our nobles his bonnet shall vail,
Who at Rere Cross on Stanmore meets Allan a Dale.”

It is also interesting as being the traditional spot where Malcolm Canmore and William the Conqueror met to decide by battle the boundary line of their respective kingdoms, but settled the dispute amicably, one of the articles of agreement being that “in the midst of Stainmoor there should be set up a cross with the King of England’s image on the one side, and the King of Scotland’s on the other, to signify that one is to march to England and the other to Scotland.”

Beyond this we are not tempted to go, as a bitter wind is rising, and dark night is falling; so we make the best of our way back to Bowes, well primed for a re-perusal of ‘Nicholas Nickleby’ over the fire in the cosy parlour of the Golden Lion, Barnard Castle.

THACKERAY AND DICKENS

By Lewis Melville

The first meeting of these two great writers took place early in 1836. 'Pickwick' was being published in monthly parts, and Robert Seymour, who invented the original design of Mr. Pickwick, after having completed the drawings for the first two or three numbers, had committed suicide. Another artist was wanted immediately, and Thackeray volunteered for the post. Years later, at a Royal Academy dinner, responding to the toast of "Literature," with which the names of Dickens and himself were associated, Thackeray referred to his now famous offer, the refusal of which he persisted in calling, "Mr. Pickwick's lucky escape."

"Had it not been for the direct act of my friend who has just sat down," he said, "I should most likely never have been included in the toast which you have been pleased to drink; and I should have tried to be, not a writer, but a painter, or designer of pictures. That was the object of my early ambition; and I can remember when Mr. Dickens was a very young man, and had commenced delighting the world with some charming humorous works, of which I cannot mention the name, but which were coloured light green, and came out once a month, that this young man wanted an artist to illustrate his writings; and I recollect walking up to his chambers in Furnival's Inn with two or three drawings in my hand, which, strange to say, he did not find suitable. But for the unfortunate blight which came over my artistic existence, it would have been my pride and pleasure to have endeavoured one day to find a place on these walls for one of my performances. This disappointment caused me to direct my attention to a different walk of art, and now I can only hope to be 'translated' on these walls, as I have been, thanks to my talented friend, Mr. Egg."

Thackeray was never tired of paying tribute, private and public, to the works of his contemporaries. He was outspoken in praise of Cruikshank and Leech, who, in some measure, might be regarded as his rivals in comic portraiture. "What would Punch be without Leech's pictures?" he wrote in an article which not unnaturally annoyed the other contributors. And in 1863, a few months before his death, when Cruikshank was exhibiting his works, anxious to render what help he could to an old friend, “kind Thackeray came with his grave face, and looked through the little gallery, and went off to write one of his charming essays,” which only appeared in the Times.

He wrote with appreciation, not too strictly critical, of Macaulay and Washington Irving; of Hood (whose “Song of the Shirt” he pronounced the finest lyric ever written), of Lever, and of Charlotte Bronte. Even Bulwer Lytton, whom with caustic humour he had attacked in ‘The Yellowplush Papers,’ he praised for the example he set to other authors by being “thoroughly literate;” and, speaking at the Royal Literary Fund dinner in 1852, he eulogised Disraeli, whose ‘Coningsby’ he had reviewed in The Pictorial Times, and afterwards had so amusingly parodied in Punch — a parody which the victim amply avenged, when in ‘Endymion’ he wrote about “Sainte-Barbe” and ‘Topsy-Turvy’ (Thackeray and ‘Vanity Fair’). It is not generally known that Thackeray wanted to parody both Dickens and himself, but the proprietors of Punch declined to accept a parody of Dickens, and so both skits remained unwritten. When Thackeray, ill in bed, read “The Idylls of the King,” he wrote to the poet: “Oh! I must write to him now for this pleasure, this delight, this splendour of happiness which I have been enjoying;” and when Tennyson’s “Grandmother” appeared in Once a Week: “I wish I could have got that poem for the Cornhill, I would have paid fifty pounds for it,” the great novelist exclaimed: “But I would have given five hundred pounds to have been able to write it.” He revered “the great old Goethe,” and his enthusiasm was thoroughly aroused by the works of Dumas. “All the forenoon,” he wrote from Paris in 1849 to Mrs. Brookfield, “I read with intense delight a novel called ‘Le Vicomte de Bragelonne’: a continuation of the famous ‘Mousquetaires,’ and just as interesting, keeping one panting from volume to volume, longing for more.” A few years later in America, he said to Mrs. Cooke:

“Dumas is charming. He is better than. Walter Scott. ... I came near writing a book on the same subject, ‘Les Trois Mousquetaires,’ and taking Monsieur D’Artagnan for my hero. D’Artagnan was a real character of the age of Louis XIV., and wrote his own ‘Memoires.’ I remember picking up a dingy copy of them on an old bookstall in London, price sixpence, and intended to make something of it. But Dumas got ahead of me — he snaps up everything. He is wonderful.”

But though he thought Dumas greater than Scott, yet for the latter he felt much admiration and even reverence. When a popular novelist one day justified himself for something he had written by urging that Scott has written it also, Thackeray replied: “I do not think that it becomes either you or me to speak of Sir Walter Scott as if we were his equals. Such men as you or I should take off our hats at the very mention of his name.”

Thackeray was never so happy as when he could pay a compliment to his friends in a book. “The young Aga came for a pair of shoes; his contortions were so delightful as he tried them on that I remained with great pleasure, wishing for Leech to be at hand to sketch his lordship and his fat mamma, who sat on the counter,” he wrote in ‘From Cornhill to Grand Cairo.’ And in the same volume, a little further on: “You can’t put down in prose that delicious episode of natural poetry” (“The Bay of Glaucus”); “it ought to be done in a symphony, full of sweet strains of clear iambics, such as Milnes knows how to write.” In one of his latest novels, ‘The Adventures of Philip,’ he concluded a chapter: “There was a pretty group for the children to see, and Mr. Walker to draw.” In posthumous editions, however, this has been altered to “for an artist to draw.”

Above all his contemporaries Thackeray delighted to honour Dickens, and he never lost an opportunity of paying graceful tribute in his books or in his lectures; while his private correspondence is studded with remarks testifying to his sincere appreciation of his great rival’s works. “Get ‘David Copperfield,’ by jingo, it’s beautiful; it beats the yellow chap of this month (‘Pendennis’) hollow:” and writing of the same book in Punch, he said:

“How beautiful it is, how charmingly fresh and simple! In those admirable touches of tender humour — and I shall call humour, Bob, a mixture of love and wit — who can equal this great genius? There are little words and phrases in his book which are like personal benefits to the reader.”

Of ‘A Christmas Carol’ he wrote: “It seems to me a national benefit, and to every man or woman who reads it a personal kindness”; and he referred to ‘The Battle of Life/ and the other Christmas stories as, “these charming little books of Mr. Dickens’s which are chorals for Christmas executed in prose.” In the lecture on ‘Charity and Humour,’ which he delivered in 1855 for a charitable purpose, he introduced the following story against himself.

“All children ought to love him” [Dickens]; “I know two that do, and read his books ten times for once they peruse the dismal preachments of their father. I know one who, when she is happy, reads ‘Nicholas Nickleby’; when she is unhappy, reads ‘Nicholas Nickleby’; when she is tired, reads ‘Nicholas Nickleby’; when she is in bed, reads ‘Nicholas Nickleby’; when she has nothing to do, reads ‘Nicholas Nickleby’; and when she has finished the book, reads ‘Nicholas Nickleby’ again. This candid young critic, at ten years of age, said, ‘I like Mr. Dickens’ books better than your books, papa,’ and frequently expressed her desire that the latter author should write a book like one of Mr. Dickens’ books. Who can?”

This charming passage drew an acknowledgment from Dickens.

“I have read in the Times to-day an account of your last night’s lecture,” he wrote to Thackeray, “and cannot refrain from assuring you in all truth and earnestness that I am profoundly touched by your generous reference to me. I do not know how to tell you what a glow it spread over my heart. Out of its fulness I do entreat you to believe that I shall never forget your words of commendation. If you could wholly know at once how you have moved me, and how you have animated me, you would be the happier, I am sure.”

Again, when Thackeray read the number of ‘Dombey and Son’ containing the description of the death of Paul, he put it in his pocket, went to the Punch Office, and flung it down before Mark Lemon. “There’s no writing against this,” he exclaimed excitedly. “One hasn’t an atom of chance; its stupendous.” And this, too, when ‘Vanity Fair’ was in course of publication, and the author of that “little book” was also describing a death scene:

“No more firing was heard at Brussels — the pursuit rolled miles away. The darkness came down on the field and city, and Amelia was praying for George, who was lying on his face, dead, with a bullet through his heart.”

And nowadays, in spite of Thackeray’s praise, and Lord Jeffrey’s — “There has been nothing in literature like the actual dying of that sweet Paul,” this death-bed scene is regarded as typical of Dickens at his worst, as “the kind of thing that appears in Sunday-school books about the virtuous little boy that died!”

But Thackeray was too keen a critic unduly to depreciate his own writings.

“Have you read Dickens? Oh! it is charming! brave Dickens!” he wrote to Mrs. Brookfield. “It has some of his very prettiest touches, those inimitable touches, which make such a great man of him; and the reading of the book has done another author a great deal of good. In the first place, it pleases the other author to see that Dickens, who has long left off alluding to the author’s works, has been copying the O.A., and greatly simplifying his style, and overcoming the use of fine words. By this the public will be the gainer, and ‘David Copperfield’ will be improved by taking a lesson from ‘Vanity Fair.’ Secondly, it has put me on my mettle, for ah! madame, all the mettle was out of me, and I have been dreadfully and curiously cast down this month past. I say, secondly, it has put me on my mettle, and made me feel that I must do something: that I have fame, and name, and family, to support.”

Indeed, Thackeray was constrained to admit that Dickens was not a deep thinker, but, he said, “he has a clear and a bright-eyed intelligence, which is better than philosophy. I think he is equal to Fielding and Smollett — at any rate to Smollett. He is not such a scholar as Fielding was.” This, then, was the greatest difference between them: other things being equal, Thackeray’s literary culture was far wider. He was thereby enabled thoroughly to appreciate the many beauties of Dickens’s work. The latter, unfortunately, was not a discerning critic of writing other than that of his own kind, and read little and thought less of the master stylist of his day. “He” [Dickens] “can’t forgive me for my success with ‘Vanity Fair’ — as if there were not room in the world for both of us,” Thackeray wrote. And a few years later he remarked:

“Dickens is making ten thousand a year. He is very angry with me for saying so; but I will say it, for it is true. He doesn’t like me. He knows that my books are a protest against his — that if the one set are true, the other must be false. But ‘Pickwick’ is an exception, it is a capital book. It is like a glass of good English ale.”

It may confidently be assumed that Thackeray had not much doubt as to which set of books was right.

Regarded from almost any point of view these two great men present a striking contrast. Dickens at twenty-five was famous as the author of ‘Sketches by Boz’ and ‘Pickwick,’ and within the next ten years had published ‘Oliver Twist,’ ‘Nicholas Nickleby,’ ‘The Old Curiosity Shop,’ ‘Barnaby Rudge,’ ‘Martin Chuzzlewit,’ and the Christmas books.

Thackeray, who was a year older, in his twenty-fifth year, entirely unknown, contributed a short story entitled 'The Professor' to Bentley's Miscellany, then under the editorship of Dickens, and in the pages of which 'Oliver Twist' was appearing as a serial. In his thirty-seventh year he made his first serious bid for fame with 'Vanity Fair,' which, after the fashion set by Dickens, was issued in monthly parts. How it happened that popularity came to Thackeray so late (comparatively) in life was explained in an article on "Thackeray," printed in the June number of this magazine.

Their methods of working were different. Dickens was industrious in a manner that Thackeray could never claim to be. The former never doubted his powers, the latter always mistrusted his hold on the public. Even so late as 1849 he endeavoured to obtain a Government appointment.

"You are a good and lovable adviser and M.P.," he wrote to his friend Monckton Milnes, "but I cannot get the Magistrate's place, not being eligible. I was only called to the bar last year, and they require barristers of seven years' standing. Time will qualify me, however, and I hope to be able to last six years in the literary world; for though I shall write, I daresay, very badly, yet the public won't find it out for some time, and I shall live on my past reputation. It is a pity to be sure. If I could get a place and rest, I think I could do something better than I have done, and leave a good and lasting book behind me; but Fate is overruling."

What a longing for rest from the never-ceasing writing and revising is here! But while the pathos is marked a smile cannot be suppressed as one thinks of Thackeray, who had not then written 'Esmond' or 'The Newcomes,' hoping to be able to live for six years in the literary world by trading on his past reputation. Dickens, less sensitive, never doubted but that he could suit the public, though he lived to be three-score and ten. He knew what it wanted and he supplied the want. Thackeray, on the other hand, wrote as he desired to write — and the general reader is not easily trained to appreciate work of a class higher than that to which he has been accustomed.

Thackeray was terribly self-conscious, and usually presented a very poor appearance when he attempted to deliver a speech. "Why can't they get Dickens to take the chair?" he grumbled when he had to preside at the General Theatrical Fund. "He can make a speech — and a good one. . . . I'm of no use. . . . They little think how nervous I am; and Dickens doesn't know the meaning of the word." An amusing story is recorded of the occasion when, with Mr. Fields, the well-known American publisher, Thackeray travelled to Manchester to make a speech at the founding of the Free Library Institution in that town. The would-be orator declared that although Dickens and Bulwer Lytton and Sir James Stephen were to precede him, he intended to beat each of them on this occasion. He insisted that Mr. Field should be seated directly in front of him, so that he should not miss a single word. Later, as he rose, he looked at his friend as much as to say, "I'll show you what speaking is." He began fluently, was excellent for two minutes, and then, in the midst of a most earnest sentence, stopped suddenly, gave a look of comic despair and sat down. "My boy," he said, when the meeting was over, "my boy, you have accidentally missed hearing one of the finest speeches ever prepared by a great British orator." Again, Thackeray hated the lecture desk, while Dickens declared he never felt the least diffidence in addressing an audience. The former appeared on the platform simply as a well-bred gentleman reading, to a large circle of friends, certain essays with which he was well acquainted; the latter gave dramatic readings from his books.

There are many meetings between the two men recorded, notably when they were both staying at Boulogne in 1854, and at the private theatricals at Tavistock House in 1855. Later in the same year, on October 11th, Dickens took the chair at a grand banquet given at the London Tavern to wish Thackeray God-speed on the eve of his departure to America to deliver the Lectures on the Georges, and proposed the health of the guest of the evening. Two years later, when Thackeray was canvassing at Oxford, he sent Dickens a droll note urging him to "come down and make a speech, and tell them who I am, for I doubt whether more than two of the electors have ever heard of me, and I think there may be as many as six or eight who have heard of you." But Dickens did not go.

And then came the unfortunate Edmund Yates affair. Into the details of this quarrel — of which a full account is given in 'The Life of William Makepeace Thackeray' — it is unnecessary to enter. At the time it was believed (and the belief has not yet been refuted), that Dickens, acting for Yates, conducted the matter in a spirit hostile to Thackeray. Mr. Yates has since declared that there was no real intimacy or anything like friendship between the two men, and he asserted that after the first Thackeray was more angry with Dickens than with the original offender who, much to his detriment, was made the subject of a trial of strength between them. Mr.

Jefferson has supported this opinion by avowing that Thackeray said to him, "You must not think, young 'un, I am quarrelling with Mr. Yates, I am hitting the man behind him." How far these statements are accurate it is not difficult to determine. Certainly if jealousy existed between the two men it was not on Thackeray's side. No man with fewer literary jealousies and animosities ever existed. But it must be admitted that it was Dickens the author rather than Dickens the man whom he admired. "Genial? Yes," he once said of him. "But frank" — and a twinkle came over the spectacles — "well, frank as an oyster." As a result of the affair, the novelists did not speak for some years. At last they met on the steps of the Athenaeum Club a few days before the Christmas of 1863. They passed each other, then Thackeray turned back, and with outstretched hand went up to Dickens and said he could no longer bear to be on any but the old terms of friendship.

"I saw him . . . shortly before Christmas at the Athenaeum Club," Dickens has recorded, "when, he told me he had been in bed three days — that after these attacks he was troubled with cold shiverings which quite took the work out of him, and that he had it in his mind to try a new remedy which he described. He was very cheerful, and looked very bright."

A few days later Dickens was looking down into the grave of his great rival.

"You will have heard about poor Thackeray's death — sudden and yet not sudden — for he had long been alarmingly ill," Dickens wrote to a friend. "At the solicitation of Mr. Smith and some of his friends I have done what I would gladly have excused myself from doing if I felt I could, written a couple of pages about him in what was his own magazine. Therein I have tried so far as I could, with his mother and children before me, to avoid the fulsome and injudicious trash that has been written about him in the papers. . . . You can have no idea of the vile stuff . . . people who would have beslavered him living, began to bespatter him dead."

MEMORIES OF CHARLES DICKENS

From: Chambers's Edinburgh Journal, November 13, 1897, p.721-725

By Maltus Questell Holyoake

Much has been written about Charles Dickens, and much more will doubtless be written. The public delight in Dickensiana is not likely to be sated in our lime. The slightest personal recollection of him, or discovery of fresh facts respecting the characters he created or the localities he depicted, is always read with universal avidity. Though one of those persons, daily getting less numerous, who remember Dickens in the flesh, my memories of him may not be very vivid or very remarkable; but such as they are, I doubt not that some lover of the dead author will read them with interest.

Some forty years ago, when the immortal writer whose name is now a household word in all countries was witching the world with noble writing, I was a very small boy; but even then Dickens was a much-appreciated novelist with me, and one of the first masters of fiction with whose works I became acquainted. I well remember, in my childhood's days, the issue of David Copperfield, in green - covered monthly parts, with two illustrations by 'Phiz' (Hablot K. Browne), price one shilling. The publication of these parts was awaited all over England with interest and impatience. In my own home their appearance was looked for with pleasurable expectancy; for, as a treat, my elder sister used to read to a select auditory, consisting of my mother, my brother, and myself, chapters of poor Doady's adventures. These informal readings took place after tea, and sorry were we when the part was exhausted, and we had to wait for the next instalment. In this way I became acquainted with the magniloquent Micawber, the good-humoured Traddles, the slimy Uriah, the child-wife Dora, the faithful Peggotty, the Royalist Mr Dick, and the rest of the characters of that delightful book, which I have re-read many times, and was reading only the other day with unabated enjoyment.

I am very conscious that such memories of the famous novelist as I have preserved in my mind must seem ‘stale, flat, and unprofitable ‘ reading, after the recent reminiscences of his son, Charles Dickens the younger — now, too, no more; but as some justification of my temerity in penning such few facts as I can recall, I may mention that my earliest recollections were associated with Dickens. At the time of which I write my home was a house overlooking the grounds of Tavistock House, where he resided, and I used frequently to see him walking in those grounds, taking, I imagine, a quiet constitutional when the demands upon his time did not permit of his taking the pedestrian exercise in the direction of Highgate or Hampstead, of which he was so fond. At the end of the garden of our house was a substantial outhouse, used as a play-room by us children. This outhouse was roofed with lead, and the roof being fiat, it formed a point of vantage from which I used to watch Dickens’s sons (each now of distinction in his own branch of life) playing cricket and other games, with, as often as not, their distinguished father looking on. Both before and since Dickens lived there, Tavistock House possessed other notable residents, and Perry of the Morning Chronicle, Frank Stone the Royal Academician, Mr (now Sir) James Stansfeld, Georgina Weldon, and Gounod the composer have at various times been occupants.

As I lived amid literary surroundings, and as my father, George Jacob Holyoake, combined the allied occupations of author, editor, publisher, and lecturer, it is not to be wondered at that as a youth I possessed literary aspirations; and, as is the case with many others, they were about all I did possess at that time. An ardent desire which actuated me to make the fortune of a publication with the discernment to recognise the genius of my pen was not gratified ; and although (he Thames flows conveniently near Fleet Street, I found that my efforts at authorship did not set that river on fire. They might, however, have assisted to create a fire of some sort in an editorial office; but if so, I knew it not. It was only natural that I should wish to give an editor for whose works I had such admiration as Dickens the advantage (?) of publishing some of the (in my own estimation) brilliant articles I was then producing. I therefore, being sixteen years of age at the time, sent one of my effusions to All the Year Round. It was promptly returned, as no doubt it deserved to be, with one of the usual notes of rejection in the lithographed handwriting of Dickens in the blue ink which he always used. Writers do not as a rule, I believe, trouble to keep the brief and unwelcome editorial intimations that their contributions are ‘declined with thanks,’ ‘unsuitable,’ or returned ‘owing to want of space,’ but I have preserved the communication from All the Year Round thirty-five years, and here it is:

Office Of ‘All The Year Round,’
A Weekly Journal Conducted By Charles Dickens.
No. 26 Wellington Street, Strand,
London, W.G, April 12th, 1862.

Mr Charles Dickens begs to thank the writer of the paper entitled ‘A Reminiscence of the Prince Consort’ for having done him the favour to offer it a- a contribution to these pages. He much regrets, however, that it is not suited to the requirements of All The Year Round.

The manuscript will be returned under cover, if applied for as above.

All the Year Round has long ago been incorporated with Household Words, which it superseded on its first appearance on April 30, 1859, after the disagreement Dickens had with his publishers. It was in All the Year Round that Dickens’s novels A Tale of Two Cities and Great Expectations first appeared. As most readers of Dickens’s works know, the original of Boythorn in Bleak House was Walter Savage Landor, the poet; and it is a singular fact that the last contribution of Dickens himself to the publication now absorbed by Household Words was an article on the irascible but kind-hearted author of The Pentameron.

Another document I possess in Dickens’s hand-writing is an old, torn, large-sized blue envelope endorsed “Charles Dickens Copy,” and addressed to ‘Mr James Birtles, Mr Whiting’s Printing Office.’ It was rescued from Mr Whiting’s waste-paper basket by a friend and given to me as a literary relic. I have treasured for many years this torn envelope that once contained Dickens’s ‘copy.’ ‘Copy,’ some readers may lie unaware, is a printer’s term for manuscript.

The eldest son of the novelist, in his recently published recollections of his father, states that in his opinion the strain and excitement consequent on Dickens’s public readings in England and America had a distinct effect towards shortening his life. I had the good fortune to hear him, read a selection from his works at St James’s Hall. One was the story of Little Emily, from David Copperfield, and I shall never forget the height of dramatic power to which he rose when describing the death of Steerforth. In my mind’s eye I can see him now. He so threw himself into the tragic spirit of the incident (and who should so truly interpret the meaning of a passage, I and the real effect intended, as the writer who created it?) that I never wondered to hear that at the conclusion of his reading he was exhausted and almost fainting.

Once, when a boy, I was reading Bleak House, after a long illness, and burst into tears when I came to the death of poor Jo, so greatly did Dickens’s touching description of the imaginary death of the little crossing-sweeper affect me. A pathetic passage in a book, or a pathetic voice in a play always gives me a cold shiver down the spine, and a choking sensation in the throat even now. If the mere perusal of the creations of Dickens’s genius, according as they were grave or I gay, could affect the sensibilities of his readers, as I doubt not they have others besides myself, how much more were their emotions aroused when under the spell of the author’s unequalled elocutionary powers!

Dickens acted every piece he read, and moved his audience to smiles or tears as his theme was humorous or pathetic. In the murder scene in Oliver Twist, where Bill Sikes slays Nancy, Dickens was especially dramatic, and his hearers held their breath, enchained by the honor and intensity of his description. This piece, too, which involved study and both mental and physical strain, affected Dickens's nerves and health. Dickens it must be remembered was reading all the evening. No actor who impersonates a single character is ever so long and continuously at full tension as was the case with Dickens; and the actor has frequent rests between his appearances on the stage. The present generation cannot realise the intensity with which Dickens, a born actor, gave his wonderful representations. For an author to read his works in public was then a novelty; and Dickens's unparalleled success in his new and arduous undertaking created a sensation and excitement that nowadays cannot be adequately comprehended. The influence of his readings, too, was to awaken the better feelings of humanity; and how many seasonable and kindly thoughts and charitable deeds were inspired by his reading of A Christmas Carol alone will never be known. It was a lay sermon that would tend to bring nearer the golden time when

Each man works for all men's good,
And all men work in noble brotherhood.

Another occasion on which I saw Dickens was at a meeting at the Adelphi Theatre in connection with the Royal Dramatic College. Charles Dickens, whose interest in theatrical matters needs no enlarging upon, was in the chair. At that time I was assisting my father at his Fleet Street publishing house, and being so near the Adelphi Theatre, I seized the opportunity of running down to hear what Dickens might have to say. The meeting was held in the afternoon, and it comes back to me after all the long years that have passed, how dull and dingy the theatre looked in the daytime. Dickens, to my disappointment, gave a thoroughly business-like address, unrelieved by brilliancies of thought or touches of Dickensian humour as I had hoped. He, however, made a model chairman, and dealt with several interruptions in a manner which showed intimate acquaintance with the procedure of public assemblies. Edmund Yates, the beau-ideal of a smart young literary 'man about town,' was there. Yates was then writing the 'Flaneur' in the Morning Star, a column of club gossip which was the pioneer of the personal paragraph so universal nowadays. He made the best speech of the afternoon, and in speculating upon the prospects of the College anticipated a time when it might possibly have

Prudes for proctors, dowagers for deans,
And sweet girl-graduates in their golden hair.

I could not help remarking, in my own mind, how neatly the Tennysonian quotation was introduced, and how cleverly Yates led up to it.

The last time I saw Dickens was in 1863, at the funeral of William Makepeace Thackeray, to which I accompanied my father. Although December, it was as bright and sunny as a summer day. On getting out at the railway station we encountered George Cruikshank, with whom in early life Thackeray had studied etching, and whose illustrations were a feature of Dickens's earlier works. Cruikshank was then in his seventieth year. He walked with us to Kensal Green Cemetery, and the day being warm I carried his overcoat. The great temperance artist was as quaint and odd in manner and appearance as any of his own caricatures. 'George,' as his intimates called him, possessed histrionic tastes, and used to appear as Macbeth and in other Shakespearian characters at Sadler's Wells. He was associated with Dickens, too, in the amateur performances in connection with the promotion of the Guild of Literature and Art. Cruikshank was also a volunteer officer, and, on the occasion of some review, a comic bard wrote, in allusion to his temperance proclivities, lines which I still recall:

Fancy Cruikshank, if you please,
On a horse with groggy knees!

At Kensal Green Cemetery we found Mr Moncure D. Conway, then newly arrived in England, with whom I had already the pleasure of being acquainted. The biographer of Thomas Paine was then mid until recently the minister of South Place Chapel, Finsbury — a worthy successor of W. J. Fox, M.P., Unitarian preacher, Anti-Cornlaw agitator, and one of the founders of the Westminster Review. Another mourner at the graveside to whom my father introduced me was Louis Blanc, the French Republican, then in exile. I regarded with respect and attention the politician whose writings created the Revolution of 1848. Louis Blanc possessed an intellect as great as his form was diminutive, and was eminently one to Be measured by his soul;

The mind's the standard of the man.

He was very sensitive of his small stature, which had exposed him on more than one occasion to the painful ridicule of the feeble-minded. It is related by a biographer of forty years ago, that at the outset of his public life he embraced the diplomatic profession, and having been appointed secretary to his cousin, he first attended one of the parties of the famous Duchesse de Dino. Reports of his attainments and ambitions had preceded him, and his appearance was awaited with interest. He was presented by his uncle, the celebrated Pozzo di Borgo; and on the announcement of the well-known name, all eyes were directed to the uncle, whose portly form concealed the dwarfish dimensions of his nephew. Arrived at the head of the room, the veteran Ambassador said to the Duchess, 'Permit me to introduce to your notice my nephew.' The lady raised herself with a languid air from the sofa, and exclaimed in a tone of sweet bewilderment, 'Where is he? I should be delighted to see him.' That evening Louis Blanc resigned the post which had been obtained for him with much difficulty by his uncle. The result of his unfortunate reception may be traced in every line of his work, The History of Ten Years, which Louis-Philippe was often heard to declare acted as a battering-ram against the bulwarks of loyalty in France. At another time, in England, it is reported that Blanc was driven into a state of almost madness by a lady in whose country-house he was detained by stress of weather, asking him if he would mind sleeping in the child's bed. In 1839 Blanc was attacked one night in the streets of Paris and repeatedly stabbed by an unknown assailant. He was left for dead. His attempted assassination was an act of vengeance for a political article he had written. Louis Blanc had a twin-brother who was at that time in Spain, and who felt strange pains, as if from blows, in the same part of his body, and at the same moment, as his brother in Paris was wounded. Before information reached him, he had already written to know if any misfortune had occurred. The elder Dumas founded his play The Corsican Brothers on this incident. On the establishment of the French Republic, Louis Blanc returned to the country he had served, and suffered for, and for many years before his death enjoyed the honour to which he was entitled.

Grouped round the grave of Thackeray were many names distinguished in literature, art, or the drama. Anthony Trollope, the novelist; Mark Lemon, then editor of Punch; George Henry Lewes, philosopher and critic; Sir Theodore Martin; Isaac Butt, the predecessor of Parnell; Sir W. H.

Russell, the Times' war correspondent; Sir John Millais; Shirley Brooks, afterwards Lemon's successor in the Punch editorship; Miss Braddon, who had but recently disclosed Lady Audley's Secret; Charles Mathews, the actor; Henry Cole, C.B., of the first exhibition fame; Tom Taylor, afterwards the successor of Brooks in the Punch editorship; John Hollingshead, not then, I fancy, flickering round 'the sacred lamp of burlesque;' Creswick, the Royal Academician; Robert Browning; and many others, of more or less celebrity, were there. Charles Dickens stood beside Browning, and many besides myself gazed with interest at the keen-looking, handsome, starry-eyed writer. Dickens was not in mourning, and was wearing trousers of a check pattern, a waistcoat of some coloured plaid, and an open frock-coat. He seemed larger in stature and more robust than I had ever before noticed him. Most of those whose names are mentioned as assembled to pay the last tribute to Thackeray are now dead, and seven years later Dickens himself was no more: 'All, all are gone, the old familiar faces.'

Writing at the time to Wilkie Collins, Dickens thus expressed himself regarding the death of his fellow-novelist:

'You will have heard about poor Thackeray's death — sudden and yet not sudden — for he had been alarmingly ill; at the solicitation of Mr Smith and some of his friends, I have done what I would have most gladly excused myself from doing if I felt I could, and have written a couple of pages about him in what was his own magazine. Therein I have tried, so far as I could with his mother and children before me, to avoid the fulsome and injudicious hash that has been written about him in the papers, and delicately to suggest the true points in his character as a literary man. Happily, I suppose, you can have no idea of the vile stuff that has been written; the writers particularly dwelling on his being "a gentleman," "a great gentleman," and the like, as if the rest of us were of the tinker tribe.'

The original of this letter was recently sold at Sotheby's for fifty pounds.

In Bleak House Charles Dickens called attention to Chancery cases dragging their slow length along, and Jarndyce v. Jarndyce is doubtless entitled to the credit of lessening some of the law's delays. Oliver Twist, too, contained a vigorous attack on the shortcomings of the poor-laws, which have since been much amended. In another of his works, Dickens's description of the world-famed Circumlocution Office had a good effect on the red-tapeism of government departments. It is a wonder his powerful pen was never tempted to ridicule the laws affecting the press, seeing that he was a victim to them; for it is a fact, forgotten by many and never known by others, that at the lime of the agitation for the repeal of the Newspaper Stamp Duty, proceedings were taken by the Inland Revenue authorities against Dickens for issuing the Household Narrative of Current Events unstamped, it being a publication ‘containing news to be dispersed, and made public,’ to use the phraseology of the long-dormant act of parliament entitled the Tenth of Queen Anne. It was known that Queen Anne was dead, and everybody thought the act was too; but it was not so. A great statesman held that nothing so soon secures the repeal of unjust laws as their stringent execution. It was with this object in view that the Committee for the Repeal of the Taxes on Knowledge, in their zeal for the cause of a free press, instigated the authorities to prosecute the great novelist. In doing this, however, they undoubtedly did Dickens a bad turn, as the publication of the Household Narrative was suspended at a loss to him of, it was believed, £4000 a year. My father, who gives an account of the matter in the chapter of his Autobiography entitled ‘The Trouble with Queen Anne,’ mentions that when the Dickens trial came on, the cry in the newspaper offices was — ‘What the Dickens is news?’ — a very obvious, but not remarkable witticism.

Dickens, like his great contemporary Thackeray, and the late Robert Louis Stevenson, was struck down in the midst of uncompleted work. The kindly satirist left Denis Duval, and the invalid exile of Samoa, Weir of Hermiston and St Ives as fragmentary memorials of undiminished powers. It is well-known, however, that the bust novel of Dickens, the unfinished Mystery of Edwin Drood, was not by any means equal to his other works; indeed, his friend Wilkie Collins in a pencil note to his copy of Forster’s Life of Dickens, described it, though with all sympathy, as ‘the melancholy work or a worn - out brain.’ The impending breakdown of the health and constitution of the bright, energetic, and genial writer was of course unknown to either his friends or the public, who regarded what had already appeared of Edwin Drood as a failure. Indeed, in one of the humorous periodicals appeared an imitation of it in Dickensian language, in which a nocturnal visitor is imagined, as penetrating into Dickens’s sanctum, where he is busy writing, and beseeching the author to reveal to him (for certain reasons, which I forget) the mystery in which all the world is interested.

‘Tell me what really is the mystery of Edwin Drood?’ urges the inquisitive intruder. At last, yielding to long-continued importunity, Dickens replies in low and sepulchral tones:

‘The mystery is how it sells.’

This anecdote sufficiently indicates that the adverse opinion of the critics must have been very strong to have found reflective expression in a comic journal.

John Forster, the biographer of Dickens, considered him ‘the most popular novelist of the century,’ a verdict endorsed by Wilkie Collins, with the proviso — ‘after Sir Walter Scott.’ It is, however, the fashion of certain writers nowadays to disparage Dickens’s works; but such comments would have little effect on those who have read his books. There are writers who claim to be authorities on literature, who, so to speak, put Dickens on to a pair of intellectual scales, and adjudge accurately to their own satisfaction his fictional merits or demerits, and define his exact position among literary luminaries. Without pretending to literary infallibility myself, it has always seemed to me that Dickens is so popular with the people, because he wrote of the people. Most of his scenes and characters were those of ordinary every-day life, and would be thus interesting to ordinary every-day people. We like to read of things familiar to us, just as we hail with pleasure known spot as the reproduction of some well-known spot as a scene in a drama. It is true that the characters of Dickens are pen caricatures, accentuating the characteristics that he wished to portray; but his incidents are natural, and such as might be expected to occur, and he strikes chords which we all recognise. Dickens represents the domestic virtues, the home scenes appealing to every one. President Lincoln said that God loved the common people, and that is why he made so many of them. Dickens also loved the common people, and that is why he wrote for them. Readers fond of a rattling tide of life on the ocean wave by a sailor would choose Marryat; admirers of backwoods and prairie adventure would prefer Mayne Reid; lovers of cultured and intellectual romance may perhaps select Bulwer Lytton; those in search of rollicking Irish fun put their faith in Charles Lever or Samuel Lover; whilst for playful and tender satire Thackeray is sought. But for life as we know it, thoughts that we think, and homely experiences common to us all, Dickens is paramount.

DICKENS'S CHARACTERS AND THEIR PROTOTYPES

From: Temple Bar, May 1888, p.28-48

By F.G. Kitton

It is well known that the characters most familiar to us in the writings of Charles Dickens had originals in actual life. The novelist, in common with other famous romancers, never produced, or intended to produce, a complete picture of a living person, hut only the leading traits, embodying in his portraiture of one individual his experience of fifty; although, as we shall see, the likeness in some cases bore a remarkable resemblance to the unconscious sitter, who naturally resented the publicity thus given to his personal or mental peculiarities. For those readers of the works of Dickens who are curious to learn something concerning the prototypes of the characters so happily portrayed by his magic pen, the present attempt at their identification may not be without interest.

Charles Dickens, on leaving school in his fifteenth year, obtained employment in the office of Messrs. Ellis and Blackmore, solicitors, of Gray's Inn, and during the period of his engagement in that capacity he availed himself of the numerous opportunities thus afforded him of observing, with a keenness which characterised him throughout life, the various peculiarities of lawyers, their clerks and clients; Mr. Blackmore, the junior partner, afterwards recognised, in the pages of 'Pickwick' and 'Nickleby,' several incidents that took place in the office, and the originals of many of the characters in those works were personally known to him. Dickens's early taste for theatricals was much stimulated by a fellow-clerk named Potter, with whom he chiefly associated. This boon companion afterwards figured under his proper name in one of the 'Sketches by Boz,' entitled "Making a Night of it," where he is described as a clerk in the city, whose income was limited, but whose friendship with his fellow-clerk, Mr.

Robert Smithers, was unbounded. It is undoubtedly the same young gentleman who appears as Jones, in another Sketch called “Misplaced Attachment of Mr. John Dounce,” for he is there referred to as a barrister’s clerk, “capital company — full of anecdote!” and having a penchant for “the play.”

Ordnance Terrace, Chatham, where the Dickens family resided (1816-21), is known to have furnished the characters for some of the early Sketches. “The Old Lady” was a Mrs. Newnham, who lived at No. 5; “The Half-pay Captain” was also a near neighbour, whose well-remembered oddity of behaviour was a constant source of amusement to the neighbours. It was principally in ‘Pickwick’ where Dickens most frequently utilised his knowledge of the traits of character which distinguish members of the legal profession and their victims. The thirtieth chapter commences with an elaborate analysis of the various species of the lawyer’s clerk. “There is the Articled Clerk, who has paid a premium, and is an attorney in prospective, who runs a tailor’s bill, receives invitations to parties, knows a family in Gower Street, and another in Tavistock Square, goes out of town every Long Vacation to see his father, who keeps live horses innumerable; and who is, in short, the very aristocrat of clerks.” Then comes the salaried clerk, “out-of-door, or in-door, as the case may be — who devotes the major part of his thirty shillings a week to his personal pleasure and adornment, repairs half-price to the Adelphi at least three times a week, dissipates majestically at the cider cellars afterwards, and is a dirty caricature of the fashion which expired six months ago.” Mr. George Lear, a fellow-clerk with Dickens at Gray’s Inn, informs me that he is convinced he stood for the portrait of the Articled Clerk, and that our friend Potter again appears as the salaried clerk. Mr. Lear entertains a belief that it was Dickens himself who is described as one of “the office lads, in their first surtouts, who feel a befitting contempt for boys at day-schools, club as they go home at night, for saveloys and porter, and think there’s nothing like ‘life.’” My informant is also of opinion that Potter figures still more prominently in ‘Pickwick,’ as the original of that prince of impostors and adventurers, Alfred Jingle, whose personal appearance is faithfully reproduced in the illustration representing Dr. Slammer’s defiance of Jingle. The portrait of the doctor is said to have been taken from Dr. Lamert, a regimental surgeon at Chatham, and an uncle of the novelist.

Many more or less eminent counsel (Serjeant Bumpus among others) have been pointed to as the prototypes of Serjeant Buzfuz; but, in all probability, the Serjeant was of a composite or mixed order of architecture, and burlesqued the foibles of more than one learned gentleman. Mr. Justice Stareleigh was a portrait of Mr. Justice Gazelee.

Mr. Perker, Pickwick's solicitor in the famous breach-of-promise case, was also drawn from life. Mr. Blackmore, in recording his recollections of Dickens's clerkship, says that he believes Perker was intended as a portrait of his partner Mr. Ellis, who certainly had some of Perker's peculiarities, especially that of incessant snuff-taking. There can be, however, no room for dispute as to the prototype of Mr. Pickwick himself, whose outward form has been rendered so familiar by "Phiz." His name was John Foster, a friend of Mr. Chapman (of the firm of Chapman and Hall), and he was described as "a fat old beau who would wear, in spite of ladies' protests, drab tights and black gaiters," and who lived at Richmond. The name of Pickwick may be traced to that of a Bath coach-proprietor, for it is recorded that Dickens, on seeing it painted on the door of a stagecoach which had passed him in the street, rushed into the publishers' office, exclaiming "I've got it. Moses Pickwick, Bath, coachmaster." It is interesting to learn that the same Moses Pickwick was a foundling, left one night in Pickwick Street, and brought up in Corsham workhouse till he was old enough to be employed in the stables where the mail coaches changed horses; then he got to be head ostler, and eventually coach-proprietor. His Christian name was given to him as being a foundling, and his surname from the village where he was left as an infant.*

It is fair to conjecture that Sam Weller's living prototype was a character named Simon Spatterdash (in Samuel Beazley's play called 'The Boarding-house'), a local militiaman, whose chief peculiarity lay in his quaint sayings and out-of-the-way comparisons. The part was taken by a low comedian named Samuel Vale, for whom the farce, a very popular one in the early part of the century, was revived at Drury Lane Theatre in 1822, the year after the removal of the Dickens family to London, Charles being then ten years old. Vale's quaint comparisons, like those so frequently employed by Sam Weller, were lavishly introduced by the actor into his part, and were doubtless the origin of Dickens's queer conceit. Vale had a mellowness of voice with an unctuousness of utterance which gave his drolleries of expression an unusual value, and he was recognised as an actor of genuine ability.

The suggestion that “Weller” is a form of “Veller,” and the latter is a comparative form of Vale, is not altogether without weight, but so far as the origin of the name is concerned there is some evidence worthy of consideration. The name, by no means an uncommon one at the present day, was familiar to Dickens from his earliest childhood, for the maiden name of his nurse was Mary Weller+. It has also been pointed out that a Thomas Weller once

* A correspondent in Notes and Queries (Jan. 8, 1887) says that, curiously enough, there lives at Penarth, near Cardiff, a portly Pickwick, rejoicing in the prenomen Eleazar. Sergeant Eleazar Pickwick is an officer of police in that county, and bears not only a nominal but a personal resemblance to Dickens’s hero as represented in the illustrations.

+ “There lived in Liverpool for many years a gentleman named Samuel Weller, one of whose daughters was the mother of Mrs. Butler (nee Miss Elizabeth Thompson), the well-known painter of “The Roll Call,” etc., and the other married a brother of Charles Dickens. Mr. Weller denied being the prototype of the immortal “Samivel,” as ‘Pickwick’ had been published some years before he met the author.” — Notes and Queries, April 2, 1887 kept the Granby Head in High Street, Chatham, and both the inn and its master recall to one’s mind the fictitious Marquis of Granby of which Mrs. Weller (Sam’s stepmother) was director-in-chief. Mrs. Lynn Linton, who once resided at Gad’s Hill Place, says that “old Mr. Weller was a real person, and we know him. He was ‘Old Chumley’ in the flesh, and drove the stage daily from Rochester to London and back again . . . the good-natured, redfaced old fellow.”

In the story of ‘Oliver Twist,’* Dickens introduced Mr. Fang, a police magistrate, and described his mode of administering justice. This official, before whom Oliver was brought on a charge of “fogle-hunting,” was “a lean, long-backed, stiff-necked, middle-aged man, with no great quantity of hair: and what he had, growing on the back and sides of his head. His face was stern, and much flashed. If he were really not in the habit of drinking rather more than was exactly good for him, he might have brought an action against his countenance for libel, and have recovered heavy damages.”

These attributes of Mr. Fang were also possessed by his prototype, a Metropolitan magistrate then living, upon whom Dickens desired to inflict a literary castigation. Mr. Forster tells us that the novelist, wanting for the purposes of his story an insolent and harsh police-magistrate, bethought him of an original ready to his hand in one of the London offices; and instead of pursuing his later method of giving a personal appearance that should in some sort render difficult the identification of mental peculiarities, he was only eager to get in the whole man complete upon his page, figure and face as well as manners and mind. He wrote accordingly to Mr. Haines, a gentleman who then had general supervision over the police reports for the daily papers: — “In my next number of ‘Oliver Twist’ I must have a magistrate; and casting about for a magistrate whose harshness and insolence would render him a fit subject to be shown up, I have as a necessary consequence stumbled upon Mr. Laing of Hatton Garden celebrity. I know the man’s character perfectly well; but as it would be necessary to describe his personal appearance also, I ought to have seen him, which (fortunately or unfortunately, as the case may be) I have never done. In this dilemma it occurred to me that perhaps

* Oliver Twist is the name of a person that once existed, which is proved by the following entry in the parish register of Shelford, Notts — “1563. The Vth of Januar., Dorothe Twiste, daughter of Oliver Twiste.” — Notes and Queries, June 9, 1877.

I might under your auspices be smuggled into the Hatton Garden office for a few moments some morning. If you can farther my object I shall be really very greatly obliged to you!” The opportunity was found; the magistrate was brought up before the novelist; and shortly after, on some fresh outbreak of intolerable temper, the home-secretary found it an easy and popular step to remove Mr. Laing from the bench — a comfort to everybody, saving only the principal person.

In the preface to ‘Nicholas Nickleby,’ the author states that, during the progress of that work, he derived great amusement and satisfaction from the fact that several Yorkshire schoolmasters laid claim to being the original of Squeers’, one of whom, he had reason to believe, had actually entertained thoughts of bringing an action for libel to bear upon the case, whereas another, whom the cap likewise fitted, meditated a journey to London “for the express purpose of committing an assault and battery upon his traducer”; a third perfectly remembered being waited on by two gentleman, “one of whom held him in conversation, while the other took his likeness; and, although Mr. Squeers has but one eye, and he has two, . . . still he and all his friends and neighbours know at once for whom it is meant, because — the character is so like him.” Dickens explains that Mr. Squeers is the representative of a class, and not of an individual; that “where imposture, ignorance, and brutal cupidity are the stock-in-trade of a small body of men, and one is described by these characteristics, all his fellows will recognise something belonging to themselves, and each will have a misgiving that the portrait is his own.” It will be remembered that Dickens and his illustrator travelled together to the North of England, for the purpose of collecting material for ‘Nickleby,’ making the King’s Head, at Barnard Castle, their head-quarters. The novelist there made enquiries concerning the state of the neighbouring boarding-schools, and was directed to one known as Bowes Academy, at Greta Bridge. The master, whose name was William Shaw, received Dickens and his companion with extreme hauteur, and did not so much as withdraw his eyes from the operation of pen-making during their interview. It is said that “Phiz,” watching his opportunity, sketched him on his nail (a branch of the Fine Arts of which I must confess extreme ignorance), reproducing him so exactly, that when the more finished representation of him appeared in the book, the school began to decline, and ultimately became deserted. There are many persons still living (who were pupils of William Shaw and well remember his academy at Bowes) who assert that the school in question was believed to have been one of the best of its kind, and that the master was by no means such a wretch as that depicted by the novelist. It was, indeed, warmly affirmed by some old residents in Barnard Castle that the alleged prototype of Squeers was, in private life at least, an excellent and amiable man, and believing the imputation to be levelled at himself (instead of, as was really the case, at the bad system which had long prevailed in that part of the country), his sensitiveness caused him to become an object of ridicule to his neighbours, and this, together with the subsequent loss of his pupils, utterly broke his spirit.

Further evidence confirming this account may be found in the autobiography of Mr. H. F. Lloyd, the well-known Glasgow comedian. He was a pupil of William Shaw, whom he represents as “ a most worthy and kind-hearted, if somewhat peculiar, gentleman. . . I can see him now as plainly as I did then, and can testify to the truth of the outward presentment of the man as described by Dickens, and depicted by his artist in the pages of his novel — allowing, of course, for both being greatly exaggerated. A sharp, thin, upright little man, with a slight scale covering the pupil of one of his eyes. Yes. There he stands, with his Wellington boots and short black trousers, not originally cut too short, but from a habit he had of sitting with one knee over the other, and the trousers being tight, they would get ‘ruck’d’ half-way up the boots. Then, the clean white vest, swallow-tailed black coat, white neck-tie, silvermounted spectacles, close-cut iron-grey hair, high-crowned hat worn slightly at the back of his head, and there you have the man.” Mr. Lloyd writes in almost glowing terms of the excellence of the school, its situation and internal arrangements; and as for Mr. Shaw’s lifting his hand to a boy, save in the way of kindness, such a thing was almost unknown! He would walk round the school-room, look over his pupils while writing, and here and there pat a boy on the head, making encouraging remarks the while. He was an adept on the flute, and would sometimes sit by the bedside of a sick boy for an hour or two together to amuse him. If these statements are true (and the evidence is strong in that direction), such was the man that Dickens, with the best intentions possible, pilloried as Squeers, and caused him to suffer for the misdeeds of his neighbours. It must be admitted, with feelings of regret, that both the novelist and the artist committed the error of too faithfully reproducing, by pen and pencil, the personal peculiarities of William Shaw, and in transferring him to another school then existing in the neighbourhood, which was similar to that described in the story, and was presided over by a genuine Squeers. There is, however, a rather curious coincidence in connection with this subject. In 1823, sixteen years before the publication of ‘Nickleby,’ two remarkable trials took place, bearing on the cruelties practised in the cheap boarding-schools of Yorkshire. The name and address of the defendant in both cases were identical with those of the prototype of Squeers, and the facts then made public strongly resembled the condition of things at Dotheboys Hall. It is more than probable that Dickens’s attention had been drawn to these particular cases, and that he subsequently utilised those facts as leading features in his story; but whether the defendant was in any way related to the unfortunate man whom “Phiz” sketched “not wisely, but too well,” there is no evidence to show.

Turning to a more genial subject, there is the novelist's authority for stating that the portraits of those most exceptional personages, the Brothers Cheeryble, were drawn from life; that their noble characteristics were not creations of his brain, but were absolutely founded on fact. Their prototypes were the Brothers Grant (Daniel and William), merchants and manufacturers, of Ramsbottom and Manchester, whose acquaintance Dickens made during his visit to that neighbourhood in 1838. The two brothers were born at Elchies, Morayshire, where their father, William Grant, was a small fanner, who, being ruined by a flood, afterwards became a cattle-drover. Subsequently he commenced business in a very small way in Manchester, and prospered, when in 1790 the family was located in a retail shop in the market-place, Bury, where they sold linen, prints, small-wares, etc.; the sons, at that time, being employed at some printworks in the neighbourhood. The Grants, through their perseverance and courtesy, rose so rapidly, that on the retirement of the first Sir Robert Peel, and by his special help and favour, they became, in 1806, the owners of the extensive works at Ramsbottom where they carried on the business of logwood grinding, calico printing, and dyeing. Within ten years the firm of William Grant and Brothers had become one of the most famous in Lancashire. Like the Brothers Cheeryble they laboured to help every good work, both privately and publicly, and were among the founders of the Royal Institution. Of private benefits conferred may be mentioned the encouragement given by direct commissions to Nasmyth, the painter, and the practical help accorded to his son, the eminent engineer. The Brothers Grant died many years ago, but in the district where they resided, their names are still remembered and dearly cherished.*

Mrs. Ewebank, whose husband kept the King's Head, at Barnard Castle (where the novelist stayed), knew the original of John Browdie, the good-natured Yorkshireman, quite well — his real name was John F —, of Broadiswood, a farmer, and lie married a Miss Dent, a cousin of Miss Shaw.

It is generally supposed that Mrs. Nickleby is a portrait of Mrs. John Dickens, the novelist's mother. A writer says that Mrs. Dickens had been very nice-looking in her youth. She was a little woman, thoroughly good-natured, easy-going, and companionable, and the likeness between her and Mrs. Nickleby is simply the exaggeration of some slight peculiarities. "She possessed an extraordinary sense of the ludicrous, and her power of imitation was something quite astonishing. On entering a room, she almost unconsciously took an inventory of its contents; and if anything happened to strike her as out of place or ridiculous, she would afterwards describe it in the quaintest possible manner. In like manner she noted the personal peculiarities of her friends and acquaintances. She had also a fine vein of pathos, and could bring tears to the eye³ of listeners when narrating some sad event."

As the original of Miss La Creevy, the good-natured little miniature-painter, I would suggest Miss Rose Emma Drummond, who practised the same genteel profession at the time 'Nickleby' was written. This suggestion carries some weight on the discovery of the interesting fact that, in 1835 (about three years prior to the commencement of the novel), Dickens sat to Miss Drummond for his portrait on ivory, which was executed as an "engagement" present for Miss Catherine Hogarth, afterwards Mrs. Charles Dickens.*

Another character in 'Nickleby,' concerning whose prototype a clue is afforded, is Newman Noggs, the confidential clerk and factotum of Mr. Ralph Nickleby, whom he served "for rather less than the usual wages of a boy of thirteen." His name, as well as personality, was suggested by that of Newman Knott, an impoverished gentleman who went regularly to the offices of Messrs. Ellis and Blackmore during the period of Dickens's clerkship there, for the purpose of receiving the sum of seven shillings weekly, given, it is believed, by a friend at Chichester who had known him in his prosperity. Knott had previously held a fairly good position as a tenant-farmer in Sussex, but his expensive tastes ruined him. His eccentricities and personal history were a source of great amusement to the clerks, and the tricks and manoeuvres he resorted to in endeavouring to forestall the weekly allowance highly delighted Dickens, who doubtless availed himself of the hints thus afforded him in the portrayal of Newman Noggs.

During the time that Dickens and "Phiz" were investigating the subject of the Yorkshire schools, they lodged at the principal hotel in Barnard Castle, in the county of Durham, and immediately opposite the hotel was a watchmaker's shop, easily seen by the novelist from his sitting-room window. Over the shop-front was conspicuously placed the name of "Humphreys, Clockmaker," which fixed itself so indelibly on the author's mind, that he gave it to the clockmaker in his next story, and wrote to tell "Master Humphreys" what he had done, sending him, at the same time, a copy of 'Nicholas Nickleby.' As for the original of the famous clock itself, we learn that its manufacture was commenced in 1828 by William Humphreys, son of Thomas Humphreys, the then proprietor of the shop. On its completion the following year it was placed in a niche on the right-hand side of the glass shop-door, where Dickens first saw it, and where in passing he frequently consulted it for the correct time, thus becoming acquainted with the owner and his son, Master Humphreys. The shop was a veritable "curiosity shop," containing, as it did, such a miscellaneous collection of toys, clocks, philosophic instruments, and relics innumerable.*

One of the most amusing characters in the 'Old Curiosity Shop' is that of the small slipshod girl who wore "a dirty coarse apron and bib, which left nothing of her visible but her face and feet," and who was called "The Marchioness" by that choice spirit, Mr. Richard Swiveller, in order "to make it seem more real and pleasant." The novelist took his first impression of this domestic young person from a maid-of-all-work possessed by the Dickens family when living in Bayham Street, Camden Town. She was an orphan from the Chatham workhouse, and continued to wait upon her employers during their incarceration in the Marshalsea. Like young Charles Dickens, she had a lodging in the neighbourhood of the prison, that she might be early on the scene of her duties; and when Charles met her, as he would do occasionally, in his lounging-place by London Bridge, he would occupy the time before the gates opened by telling her most astonishing fictions about the wharves and the tower. "But I hope I believed them myself," he would say.

The room which young Dickens then occupied was a back-attic in the house of an insolvent-court agent, in Lant Street, Boro', where Bob Sawyer lodged many years afterwards. His landlord was “a

* The clock, which is still in existence, is an interesting and scientifically constructed piece of mechanism, mounted in an ornamented wooden case of a much earlier period. It was removed in 1838 to Hartlepool, by William Humphreys, who commenced business there on his own account, his father making a new timepiece to take its place. Both clocks were shown in excellent condition in the Newcastle Jubilee Exhibition. — Monthly Chronicle of North Country Lore and Legend, Nov., 1887.

fat, good-natured, kind old gentleman. He was lame, and had a quiet old wife; and he had a very innocent grown-up son, who was lame too.” The elderly couple and their only son were dead when these particulars were related by Dickens to his biographer, who informs us that they live still very pleasantly, in another form, as the Garland family in the ‘Old Curiosity Shop.’ Turning to a minor character in the story, it is said that the first study for the poet of Mrs. Jarley’s waxwork was made from one of the rhymesters regularly employed by Robert Warren, the blacking manufacturer, whom Dickens remembered so well.

A personage who figures prominently in ‘Barnaby Rudge’ is Lord George Gordon, the veritable Lord George who led the Riots of 1780. He was born in 1752, and was the second son of Cosmo, third Duke of Gordon. He entered the Navy when a boy, in due time becoming a lieutenant, and soon afterwards conceived the project of entering Parliament, where he secured a seat. At this time he is described as being possessed of good looks and a cunning address, and to have had the art of making himself popular with all classes. Before long he began to disunite himself from both parties of the State, proclaiming himself to be “a friend of the people,” and continually bringing in matters concerning religion and the dangers of Popery. He instituted public meetings in support of the Protestant interest, declaring that the King was a Papist at heart and had violated the Coronation Oath. From that time the most disorderly scenes took place in the public thoroughfares, culminating in serious riots, the cry of “No Popery” being the only guarantee of security from violence at the hands of the mob. Lord George was arrested and charged with high treason, but was acquitted, much to the delight of his supporters. He was again arrested for treasonable acts, found guilty, and sentenced to be imprisoned in Newgate for three years. There he was struck down by gaol fever; in a few days he became delirious, muttering sentences by which he had rallied round him his fanatical and vagabond followers. With a last effort he raised himself in his bed, and half-chanting the opening words of a republican song, he expired.* Such is an outline of the career of Lord George Gordon, and readers of 'Barnaby Rudge' will see how close a resemblance it bears to the facts there related by the novelist.

In describing the personality of the aristocratic Mr. John Chester (afterwards Sir John), Dickens undoubtedly had the celebrated Lord Chesterfield in his mind. Sir John is "soft-spoken, delicately made, precise, and elegant;" he preserves a calm and placid smile, is a smooth man of the world, his speech is as elegant and as exactly ordered as his dress. Such attributes as these also characterised the alleged original, a fact which, together with the marked resemblance between their names, strengthens the supposition that Sir John is a copy of his Lordship.

The original of Grip the Raven, as every one knows, was in Dickens's possession for a considerable time, and its death was a domestic calamity. The famous bird was replaced by another, older, and larger Grip, so that 'Barnaby' should have the fruit of continual study of the habits of ravens, but he also met with an untimely end. "The first," says Dickens, "was in the bloom of his youth, when he was discovered in a modest retirement in London, by a friend of mine, and given to me. . . . He slept in a stable, generally on horseback," and "was rapidly rising in acquirements and virtues, when, in an evil hour, his stable was newly painted. He observed the workmen closely, saw that they were careful of the paint, and immediately burned to possess it. On their going to dinner, he ate up all they had left behind, consisting of a pound or two of white lead; and this youthful indiscretion terminated in death. While I was yet unconsolable for his loss, another friend of mine in Yorkshire discovered an older and more gifted raven at a village public-house, which he prevailed upon the landlord to part with for a consideration, and sent up to me." After describing the merits and eccentricities of this bird, Dickens wrote: "It may have been that he was too bright a genius to live long, or it may have been that he took some pernicious substance into his bill, and thence into his maw, which is not improbable, seeing that he new-pointed the greater part of the garden-wall by digging out the mortar, broke countless squares of glass by scraping away the putty all round the frames, and tore up and swallowed, in splinters, the greater part of a wooden staircase of six steps and a landing, but after some three years he too was taken ill, and died before the kitchen fire. He kept his eye to the last upon the meat as it roasted, and suddenly turned over on his back with a sepulchral cry of ‘Cuckoo!’“ The remains of Grip the First were stuffed and sent home in a glass case, by way of ornament to his master’s study, and some years afterwards were sold by public auction for the fancy price of £120.

In the preface to an early edition of ‘Martin Chuzzlewit’ Dickens speaks of Mrs. Gamp as a fair representation, at the time the book was published, of the hired attendant on the poor in sickness: but, as Mr. Forster says, he might have added that the rich were no better off, for Mrs. Gamp’s original was in reality a person hired by a most distinguished friend of his own, a lady, to take charge of an invalid very dear to her; and the common habit of this nurse in the sick room, among other Gampish peculiarities, was to rub her nose along the top of the tall fender. In spite of Mrs. Gamp’s propensity for strong drink and other human weaknesses, we cannot resist the humorous side of her character, nor deny that she is a general favourite.

It has already been said that Dickens, when a mere lad, lodged near the Marshalsea during his father’s incarceration there. Before he lived with the originals of the Garland family, he was handed over to a reduced old lady long known to his parents, a Mrs. Roylance, who took children in to board, and had done so at Brighton. With a few alterations and embellishments, this lady unconsciously sat for Mrs. Pipchin in ‘Dombey and Son,’ when she took in young Charles Dickens. The well-known illustration, representing Mrs. Pipchin and Paul at the fire, greatly distressed the author because “Phiz” failed to realise the scene as the former had conceived it. “He felt the disappointment more keenly, because the conception of the grim old boarding-house keeper had taken back his thoughts to the miseries of his own child life, and made her, as her prototype in verity was, a part of the terrible reality.” In his paper of notes for the number in which she appears are the various names, beginning with that of her real prototype, out of which, by a process of evolution, the name selected came to him at last — “Mrs. Roylance, Mrs. Wrychin, Mrs. Tipchin, Mrs. Alchin, Mrs. Somching, Mrs. Pipchin.” In a letter to Mr. Forster he wrote — “I hope you will like Mrs. Pipchin's establishment. It is from the life, and I was there — I don't suppose I was eight years old; but I remember it all as well, and certainly understood it as well, as I do now. . .” In the picture referred to, Paul presents a striking contrast to the grim old harridan at whose face he looks with an expression half anxious and half timid, “studying every line and wrinkle of her countenance, and peering at the hard grey eye. . . . The good old lady might have been a witch and Paul and the cat her two familiars, as they all sat by the fire together.”

It is perhaps not generally known that the original of Paul Dombey was a nephew of Dickens. He was the only child of Mr. and Mrs. Burnett (Fanny Dickens), and Master Harry Burnett is described, by one who knew the family well, as “a singular child, meditative and quaint in a remarkable degree. He was the original, as Dickens told his sister, of little ‘Paul Dombey.’ Harry had been taken to Brighton, as ‘little Paul’ is represented to have been, and had there, for hours lying on the beach with his books, given utterance to thoughts quite as remarkable for a child as those which are put into the lips of Paul Dombey. . . . The child seemed never tired of reading the Bible and his hymns, and other good books suited to his age: and the bright little fellow was always happy.”* There can be no doubt that Dickens, in his pathetic description of Paul's experience of life, recorded some of his own recollections of the days when he was under the protection of that stern guardian, Mrs. Roylance.

The prototype of Mr. Dombey was supposed by some to be Mr. Thomas Chapman, the Chairman of Lloyd's in 1844, a gentleman with whom Dickens held much friendly intercourse; but Mr. Forster entirely refutes the supposition, considering that “few things more absurd or unfounded have been invented, even of Dickens, than that he found any part of the original of Mr. Dombey in the nature, the appearance, or the manners of this estimable gentleman.” The novelist expressed great anxiety concerning “Phiz's “delineation of Dombey, and fearing something in the nature of a caricature of his merchant-hero, he was induced to indicate by a living person the type of a city-gentleman he would have had the artist select. His urgent request that the artist should “get a glimpse of A., for he is the very Dombey,” was often repeated, but was not to be complied with, and recourse was had to a series of heads, actual and fanciful, sketched on a sheet of paper by “Phiz,” from which a selection was made. Beyond this there is no further evidence as to the personality of the original of the purse-proud Dombey.

Mr. Forster had himself some knowledge of that “blue-stocking,” Miss Cornelia, the gifted daughter of Paul’s first schoolmaster, Dr. Blimber. The little wooden midshipman is such an interesting feature in ‘Dombey and Son’ that he must not be forgotten. “With his quadrant at his round black knob of an eye, and its figure in the old attitude of indomitable alacrity,” he is constantly intent on his discoveries. The present tense is here used advisedly, for the famous sign still exists. When the story was written he occupied his post of observation in Leadenhall Street, over a quaint old-fashioned shop first established in 1773 by Mr. William Heather as a “sea-chart, map, and mathematical instrument warehouse.” Mr. Heather was succeeded by Messrs. Norie and Wilson, who carried on

- Memories of the Past. Records of Ministerial Life. By James Griffin (1883). In the early part of Mr. Griffin’s ministry at Manchester, he made the acquaintance of two “genteel-looking people” who regularly attended the chapel. They were Mr. and Mrs. Burnett, and in the course of conversation the latter intimated that she was the sister of Charles Dickens, then in the height of his popularity. Her husband had passed many years of his life on the operatic stage, and when a pupil at the Royal Academy of Music, he met Miss Fanny Dickens, who was also a pupil at the same Institution, and who afterwards became his wife. His profession as a public vocalist proving uncongenial he quitted the stage, and, with his wife, taught music and singing. Their son Harry, like little Paul, died in his early youth.

the business in Dombey’s time; but some six years ago the house and shop were demolished, and the business transferred to the Minories, where the little midshipman may still be seen studying the heavens as of yore.

Dickens considered ‘David Copperfield’ as the best of his books, and the reason for his preference may be looked for in the fact that it is to a great extent autobiographical. The author has himself declared that many of the incidents in David’s career are identical with those experienced by himself, so that, up to a certain point, he may be considered as the prototype of the hero of the story. To a certain extent, also, Mr. Micawber was a portrait of the novelist’s father, who, like him, was remarkable for rhetorical exuberance, a peculiarity which found frequent and always agreeable expression in many of the novelist's letters, written long before 'Copperfield' was thought of. "No one," says his biographer, "could know the elder Dickens without secretly liking him the better for these flourishes of speech, which adapted themselves so readily to his gloom as well as to his cheerfulness, that it was difficult not to fancy they had helped him considerably in both, and had rendered more tolerable to him, if also more possible, the shade and sunshine of his chequered life. . . It delighted Dickens to remember that it was of one of his connections his father wrote a celebrated sentence: 'And I must express my tendency to believe that his longevity is (to say the least of it) extremely problematical.'" There also existed in the personal appearance of Micawber a resemblance to that of his prototype. A friend and neighbour of Mr. John Dickens describes him as "a chatty, pleasant companion, possessing a varied fund of anecdote, and a genuine vein of humour. He was a well-built man, rather stout, of very active habits, a little pompous, and very proud (as well he might be) of his talented son. He dressed well, and wore a goodly bunch of seals suspended across his waistcoat from his watch-chain."

A writer says that Dickens also availed himself of certain peculiarities of Thomas Powell, "a so-called 'literary man,'" of America, many of whose idiosyncrasies were set forth in a story published in the 'Boston Index' some years ago. Like Micawber, Powell had a trick of becoming very confidential on small or no provocation. He also had a large family, and a perfect mania for writing letters, even to persons in the same room — other points of resemblance to Mr. Dickens's Micawber."

Dora Spenlow, David Copperfield's "child-wife," was drawn from a living person, for Dickens, too, had his Dora in 1829, who, like David's fiancée, "was striven for as the only thing to be attained, and even more unattainable, for neither did he succeed, nor happily did she die; but the one idol, like the other, supplying a motive to exertion for the time, and otherwise opening out to the idolator, both in fact and fiction, a highly unsubstantial, happy, foolish time." A letter from Dickens to his biographer confirms the statement that the Dora in fiction is founded on a Dora in fact. The description of Flora, in 'Little Dorrit,' was derived from the same original

The prototype of Miss Dartle may also be partly traced. In the -story, that lady is described as possessing "a slight, short figure, dark, and not agreeable to look at, but with some appearance of good looks too . . . she had black hair, and eager black eyes, and was thin, and had a scar upon her lip.” We have Mr. Forster’s authority for stating that it was from one of Dickens’s lady friends, very familiar to him indeed, but whose name is not divulged, that he copied Miss Dartle’s peculiarity “of never saying anything outright, but hinting it merely, and making more of it that way.”

Of the original of Miss Mowcher something interesting may be told. Headers of ‘Copperfield’ will remember her as “a pousy dwarf, of about forty or forty-five, with a very large head and face, a pair of roguish grey eyes, and such extremely little arms. . . . Her chin, which is what is called a double chin, was so fat that it entirely swallowed up the strings of her bonnet, bow and all. Throat she had none; waist she had none; legs she had none, worth mentioning; for though she was more than full-sized down to where her waist would have been, if she had any, and though she terminated, as human beings generally do, in a pair of feet, she was so short that she stood at a common-sized chair as at a table.” Dickens, thinking that a grotesque little oddity among his acquaintance would be safe from recognition, had given way to the temptation of copying too closely the peculiarities of her face and figure. Although in Miss Mowcher’s ‘Ain’t I volatile’ his friends had quite correctly recognised the favourite expression of a different person, and other traits were not hers at all, yet he was shocked and grieved to discover that he had given pain to a person who saw in Miss Mowcher a strong resemblance to herself, and speedily remedied, as far as was practicable, the injury he had unintentionally inflicted by making certain alterations in the subsequent portrayal of the character.

In Harold Skimpole of ‘Bleak House’ Dickens deeply injured the susceptibilities of his friend Leigh Hunt, whose eccentricities he had unmistakably exaggerated in connecting them with Skimpole. Although the novelist felt that it was wrong in being thus tempted to utilise the power he possessed of reproducing the peculiarities of his friends and their natural traits of character, he apparently found it irresistible. Harold Skimpole’s likeness to that of his prototype was so easily recognised that it led to much remark; unfortunately, a part in the plot was assigned to him which no fascinating foibles or gaieties of speech could redeem from contempt. The story is a long one, and so well told by others that a repetition of it is unnecessary. Suffice it to say that Dickens’s intention was not an unkind one. He erred from thoughtlessness only, and often expressed his regret that he had made the character speak too much like his old friend. “Perhaps,” suggests Mr. Forster, “the only person acquainted with the original who failed to recognise the copy was the original himself (a common case); but good-natured friends in time told Hunt everything, and painful explanations followed. . . I yet well remember with what eager earnestness ... he strove to set Hunt up again in his own esteem.” He endeavoured partly to make amends by inviting and persuading Leigh Hunt’s eldest son to write an essay, setting his father in a just light, for ‘ All the Year Round.’ * But the harm was done, and could not be undone, although the novelist made all the reparation in his power in order to bring about that most desirable result.

For the character of Lawrence Boythorne he was similarly indebted to another friend, Walter Savage Landor. Boythorne forms a strong and not unpleasing contrast to Skimpole, so that the consequences arising from the portrayal were not so disastrous as in the case of Leigh Hunt; in fact, no objection was made, as ludicrous traits were employed to enrich without impairing an attractive person in the tale.

A striking pamphlet on the subject of Chancery abuses and delays afforded Dickens a valuable hint in his treatment of the great Chancery suit, in ‘ Bleak House,’ of Jarndyce v. Jarndyce. The case of Gridley (said the author, in his preface to the story) was in no essential altered from one of actual occurrence, in which, as in Jarndyce v. Jarndyce, costs were incurred to an enormous amount. He also referred to another well-known suit in Chancery, not then decided, which was commenced before the close of the last century, and in which a still more considerable sum had already been swallowed up in costs. It has been said that a certain Chancery suit now proceeding was that from which the Jarndyce case originated. The suit is that of Jennings v. Jennings, which also commenced before the close of the last century, and it arose from the intestacy of Mr. Jennings, the original owner of the property in dispute. He was a Suffolk man, who, when staying in London, became so seriously ill that he felt it desirable to complete his will, which only required his signature to make it valid; but his spectacles, which were specially needed for the purpose, had been accidentally left at his country house, whither a messenger was speedily despatched. Unfortunately, before his return the testator breathed his last, and the document was therefore valueless. The property then went to the next of kin, when the unexpected arrival on the scene of one who claimed that position (and the property appertaining thereto) caused a dispute as to the rightful heir; the property fell into Chancery, and, owing to the fact that the claimants (now numbering about four hundred) have not yet succeeded in identifying the real successor, the result is likely to be as unsatisfactory as that attending Jarndyce v. Jarndyce.

One of the suitors in that great case was “a little mad woman in a squeezed bonnet, who is always in court, from its sitting to its rising, and always expecting some incomprehensible judgment to be given in her favour. . . She carries some small letters in her reticule which she calls her documents; principally consisting of paper matches and dry lavender.” The name of the “Little Old Lady” was Flite, and her portrait was taken from life. One who knew her well informs me that she was always hovering in or about the Chancery Courts, generally in court, and that she was the victim of some prolonged Chancery suit which had turned her head.

Another character in ‘Bleak House’ can be identified. The portrait of that expert detective, Inspector Bucket, was taken from the late Mr. Field, Chief of Detective Police, who frequently had the honour of accompanying Dickens during his exploration of the haunts of crime, vice, and misery in the great Metropolis, where he found so much material for his famous stories.

We are told that the first notion of the ‘Tale of Two Cities’ occurred to the author while acting with his friends and his children in Mr. Wilkie Collins’s drama of ‘The Frozen Deep,’ and there can be no doubt that the idea was still further promoted by a perusal of Carlyle’s ‘French Revolution,’ written many years previously. The principal personage in Mr. Collins’s play, named Richard Wardour, is remarkable for extreme self-denial and other good qualities, the dramatic nature of which so struck Dickens that he availed himself of that conception of the character by reproducing the same qualities in the person of Sydney Carton, the hero of the story. Richard Wardour may therefore be considered as the original form of Sydney Carton.

Mr. Edmund Yates is, I believe, responsible for the statement that the character of Mr. Stryver, Sydney Carton’s great ally, was drawn from Mr.

Edwin James, a well-known legal functionary some thirty years ago. Mr. Yates says: "One day I took Dickens — who had never seen Edwin James — to one of these consultations. James laid himself out to be specially agreeable; Dickens was quietly observant. About four months after appeared the early numbers of 'A Tale of Two Cities,' in which a prominent part was played by Mr. Stryver. After reading the description, I said to Dickens: 'Stryver is a good likeness!' He smiled. 'Not bad, I think,' he said, especially after only one sitting!"

The Christmas stories published with 'Household Words,' and 'All the Year Round,' were the joint product of several well-known writers, each preparing one or two chapters, which in reality form a series of distinct tales. The initial chapter of 'The Haunted House' was from Dickens's pen, and he there alludes to "Mr. Undery, my friend and solicitor . . . who plays whist better than the whole Law List, from the red cover at the beginning to the red cover at the end." The description of Mr. Undery is taken from the late Mr. Fred Ouvry, who was actually the novelist's friend and solicitor. In another Christmas Number, entitled 'Tom Tiddler's Ground,' there are three chapters by Dickens, in which is introduced a remarkable personage, Mr. Mopes, a hermit, who, "by suffering everything about him to go to ruin, and by dressing himself in a blanket and skewer, and by steeping himself in soot and grease and other nastiness, had acquired great renown in all that country side. . . . He was represented as being all the ages between five-and-twenty and sixty, and as having been a hermit seven years, twelve, twenty, thirty — though twenty, on the whole, appeared the favourite term." Mr. Mopes is no illusion or creation of the fancy. He really lived, moved, and had his being, much in the manner as described. His abode in the county of Hertford pretty closely resembled the rotting, tumble-down dwelling-place so picturesquely described in 'Tom Tiddler's Ground.' His real name was James Lucas, and the spot where he resided is about two miles from Stevenage, a station on the Great Northern Railway. The hermit was so well known, that any one in the neighbourhood could direct a stranger to the habitation of "Mad Lucas," as people familiarly called him. One of his visitors describes him as "distinctly dirty, comprehensively and permanently so, a fact that was by no means difficult to ascertain, for if on other days the hermit was so far extravagant in dress as to indulge himself in a blanket and skewer, he afterwards — from economical motives, perhaps — dispensed with the skewer and retained the blanket alone, which he continually adjusted and readjusted that it might the more effectually fulfil the requirements of a fastidious public.”

James Lucas died nearly fourteen years ago, and shortly after that event a pamphlet was published giving the history of the hermit of Hertfordshire, from which we learn some interesting particulars concerning that eccentric personage. He was descended from an ancient and wealthy Irish family; his father was a man of fortune and had estates in various parts of England, besides owning large sugar plantations in the West Indies. His son, James, was born in London about the year 1811. The family residence is known as Elmwood House, situated at Redcoat's Green, midway between Hitchin and Stevenage. James Lucas, when he was eight or ten years of age, first went to reside there with his parents, and those who remember him at that time describe him as a strange child, the germs of his subsequent eccentricities being very apparent. As time advanced he allowed his hair to grow long, and rode on horseback, with or without a saddle, at all hours of the day and night. He was, however, intellectually most acute, well versed in Shakespeare, and in the standard works of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, could compose and recite poetry, and was fond of athletics. The determining cause of that life of wretchedness and seclusion which he led for a quarter of a century was, without doubt, the death of his mother, when his eccentricity developed into madness. He was passionately fond of his mother, was intensely grieved at her death, and absolutely refused to allow her body to be interred, watching it night and day for thirteen weeks, immovable and unconsolable. The funeral at length took place, when he commenced to isolate himself from the world, closed up all the rooms in the house, and lived, as we have seen, in a state of filth and semi-starvation, in such manner passing the remainder of his days and becoming an object of interest to numerous visitors, with whom he would converse through the bars of a window. Mr. Forster, who was a Lunacy Commissioner, examined him to see if he could find any trace of insanity, and, far from discovering any aberration of mind, he found the hermit to be a man of most acute intellect. He was discovered in an apoplectic fit one morning in April, 1874, and death took place a few days later. Dickens, when staying with his friend Lord Lyttou at Knebworth, was driven over to see the original of Mr. Mopes, but Lucas said that the novelist never visited him. A copy of ‘Tom Tiddler's Ground,’ given him by a friend, bore unmistakable signs of having been carefully perused by the hero himself, who pronounced the publication to be neither more nor less than one of the many attempts to injure and annoy him; he believed that an enemy, understood to be a relative, had instigated Dickens, and probably paid him well to make up the story, which, he said, was false from beginning to end, and contained many inaccuracies.

The story of 'Hunted Down' was specially written for the 'New York Ledger.' Dickens had seized upon the career of Thomas Griffiths Wainewright, the poisoner, as a foundation for his fiction, where his name appears as Mr. Julius Slinkton, of the Middle Temple. The actual facts incidental to the career of T. G. Wainewright are even more extraordinary than those related in the narrative, and it is worthy of remark that Lord Lytton, in his powerful novel, 'Lucretia,' also availed himself of the record of the villainy of the same notorious criminal.

After the completion of the first three numbers of 'Our Mutual Friend,' the illustrator of that work, Mr. Marcus Stone, told Dickens of an extraordinary trade he had discovered, through one of his painting requirements. It was the establishment of Mr. Venus, preserver of animals and birds, and articulator of human bones; the same establishment as that so minutely described by Mr. Venus himself. "My working bench. My young man's bench. A Vice. Tools. Bones, various. Skulls, various. Preserved Indian baby. African ditto. Bottled preparations, various. Everything within reach of your hand, in good preservation. The mouldy ones a-top. What's in those hampers over there again, I don't quite remember. Say, human various. Cats. Articulated English baby. Dogs. Ducks. Glass eyes, various. Mummied bird. Dried cuticle, various. Oh, dear me! That's the general panoramic view." Mr. Percy Fitzgerald has identified the shop as No. 42, St. Andrew Street, near "The Dials," which he describes as a shop whose window is filled with as disagreeable a category of objects as was found in the establishment of the apothecary in 'Romeo and Juliet' — skulls, jaw and thigh bones, skeletons of monkeys, stuffed birds, horns of all kinds, prepared skins, and everything unpleasant in the anatomical line. The proprietor of this miscellaneous stock-in-trade was, of course, the prototype of Mr. Venus. "This original character," writes Mr. Fitzgerald, "excited much attention; and a friend of the great writer, as well as of the present chronicler, passing through this street was irresistibly attracted by this shop and its contents — kept by one J. Willis. When he next saw Mr. Dickens, he said, 'I am convinced I have found the original of "Venus"; on which said

Mr. Dickens,' You are right!'“ Any one who then visited the place could recognise the dingy, gloomy interior, the articulated skeleton in the corner, the genial air of thick grime and dust; but now the place is changed, — Mr. Venus has departed, and his successor deals in secondhand clothing for ladies.

In the unfinished story of 'Edwin Drood,' considered by Longfellow as one of the novelist's most beautiful works, there are given but very slight indications of the prototypes of the characters. The picture of the opium-eater and her den was drawn from nature, the former being thus described by Mr. Fields, who accompanied the novelist to the spot: — "We found a braggart old woman blowing at a kind of pipe made of an old ink-bottle; and the words which Dickens puts into the mouth of this wretched creature in 'Edwin Drood,' we heard her croon as we leaned over the tattered bed in which she was lying."

A visitor, on being shown over Rochester Cathedral a few years ago, by chance asked the gossiping old verger whether Dickens had not got him for one of the characters in his last novel. Said he, "The question is whether I am not Tope." It is suggested that some of the better qualities and peculiarities of Durdles may be recognised in Mr. John Brooker, of Higham. The origin of some of the names may be traced to Rochester and neighbourhood, for that of Jasper is a common one in the old city, and Drood is an adaptation of Trood, the cognomen of the late landlord of the Sir John Falstaff at Gad's-hill.

Note. — Since this article was written, an item of Dickensian interest was elicited by an amusing digression in an action for damages recently heard in the High Court of Justice before Baa-on Huddleston. This was nothing less than the identification of the origin of the name of Pickwick. Mr. Henry Fielding Dickens, a son of the novelist, was retained as counsel for the defence, and in the course of the trial he intimated that he meant to call as a witness a Mr. Pickwick.

Baron Huddleston: "Pickwick is a very appropriate witness to be called by Dickens" (laughter). Mr. Dickens: "I fully believe that the sole reason why I was instructed in this case was that I might call Mr. Pickwick" (laughter). "And it may interest your Lordship to learn that the witness is a descendant — the grandnephew I believe — of Mr. Moses Pickwick, who kept a coach at Bath, and that I have every reason to believe that it was from this Moses Pickwick that the name of the immortal Pickwick was taken. I daresay your Lordship will remember that that very eccentric and faithful follower of Mr. Pickwick — Sam Weller — seeing the name outside the coach, was indignant, because he thought it was a personal reflection upon his employer, and he was accordingly anxious to inflict condign punishment upon the offender.”

Mr. Dickens, having apologised for the digression, and admitted that the temptation was too strong for him, resumed the conduct of the case.

THE FRIENDSHIP OF CHARLES DICKENS AND WASHINGTON IRVING

By T. Edgar Pemberton

CHARLES DICKENS IN 1842, THE YEAR OF HIS FIRST VISIT TO AMERICA AND HIS MEETING WITH WASHINGTON IRVING.

From a pencil drawing by R. J. Lant.

THE PERSONAL AND LITERARY ASSOCIATION OF THE GREAT AMERICAN WRITER AND THE FAMOUS ENGLISH NOVELIST-DICKENS' OWN TESTIMONY TO IRVING'S INFLUENCE UPON HIS EARLIER WORK.

In the lives of eminent literary men genius there is nothing more interesting to note than the admiration one great genius will show for the work of another equally gifted author.

This was never better exemplified than by Washington Irving and Charles Dickens. The fact is perhaps all the more remarkable because in some ways they worked in the same grooves, and the young English writer was manifestly indebted, at the outset of his career, to the already famous American litterateur. The "Sketches by Boz" were probably suggested by the "Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon," and it seems certain that unless "Old Christmas" and "Bracebridge Hall" had been written the "Pickwick Papers" would never have been embellished with those glorious merrymakings which took place at Manor Farm, Dingley Dell.

In small-minded men such things might occasion irritation, but the real giants of the pen, having appreciated the work of a coming writer, can afford to be generous, and love to applaud it. Dickens knew his Washington Irving well, and had devoured the inimitable "Sketch Book" when he was a boy of fourteen, with results eminently beneficial to himself and his countless readers. But for this we might not have had the delightful journey on the stage coach to Muggleton, have quaffed a second bowl of the enlivening wassail, have met the Dingley Dell parson with his quaint stories, or have been thrilled with the episode at the rook-shooting, when Mr. Winkle, instead of shooting at the pigeon and killing the crow, shot at the crow and wounded the pigeon.

Irving's First Letter To Dickens.

Imagine, then, the delight of Dickens when in April, 1841, a letter came to him in which Irving expressed heartfelt delight in his writings and appreciation of himself. The historian of New York had, he wrote, read all the "Boz" productions, and could no longer repress his desire to let their author know his high opinion of his talents.

It may be noted that Irving was twenty-nine years older than Dickens, who was twenty-nine when he received this letter. He had already produced “Sketches by Boz,” “Pickwick,” “Oliver Twist,” “Nicholas Nickleby,” “The Old Curiosity Shop,” and “Barnaby Rudge.”

In his enthusiastic reply we see how well he knew the contents of the “Sketch Book” and Irving’s other works.

My Dear Sir:

There is no man in the world who could have given me the heartfelt pleasure you have, by your kind note of the 13th of last month. There is no living writer, and there are very few among the dead, whose approbation I should feel so proud to earn. And with everything you have written upon my shelves, and in my thoughts, and in my heart of hearts, I may honestly and truly say so. If you could only know how earnestly I write this, you will be glad to read it — as I hope you will be, faintly guessing at the warmth of the hand I autobiographically hold out to you over the broad Atlantic.

I wish I could find in your welcome letter some hint of an intention to visit England. I can’t. I have held it at arm’s length, and taken a bird’s-eye view of it, after reading it a great many times, but there is no greater encouragement in this way than on a microscopic inspection.) should love to go with you — as I have gone, God knows how often — into Little Britain, and Eastcheap and Green Arbor Court, and Westminster Abbey! I should like to travel with you outside the last of the coaches down to Bracebridge Hall. It would make my heart glad to compare notes with you about that shabby gentleman in the oilcloth hat and red nose, who sat in the nine-cornered back-parlor of the Masons’ Arms, and about Robert Preston and the tallow chandler’s widow, whose sitting-room is second nature to me; and about all those delightful places and people that I used to walk about and dream of in the daytime, when a very small and not over-particularly-taken-care-of boy. I have a good deal to say, too, about that dashing Alonzo de Ojeda, that you can’t help being fonder of than you ought to be; and much to hear concerning Moorish legend, and poor unhappy Boabdil. Diedrich Knickerbocker I have worn to death in my pocket, and yet I should show you his mutilated carcass with a joy past all expression.

I have been so accustomed to associate you with my pleasantest and happiest thoughts, and with my leisure hours, that I rush at once into full confidence with you, and fall, as it were naturally, and by the very laws of gravity, into your open arms. Questions come thronging to my pen as to the lips of people who meet after long hoping to do so. I don't know what to say first or what to leave unsaid, and am so constantly disposed to break off and tell you again how glad I am this moment has arrived.

My dear Washington Irving, I cannot thank you enough for your cordial and generous praise, or tell you what deep and lasting gratification it has given me. I hope to have many letters from you, and to exchange a frequent correspondence. I send this to say so. After the first two or three I shall settle down into a connected style, and become gradually rational.

You know what the feeling is, after having written a letter, sealed it, and sent it off. I shall picture your reading this, and answering it, before it has lain one night in the post-office. Ten to one that before the fastest packet could reach New York I shall be writing again.

Do you suppose the post-office clerks care to receive letters? I have my doubts. They get into a dreadful habit of indifference. A postman, I imagine, is quite callous. Conceive his delivering one to himself, without being startled by a preliminary double knock!

Always your faithful friend,
Charles Dickens.

THE ENGLISH NOVELIST IN AMERICA.

For a long time Dickens had been anxious to visit America, and his biographer, John Forster, tells us that this interchange of letters set him thinking seriously of the undertaking. Re this as it may, the February of the following year (1842) saw him at the Carlton Hotel, New York, where "Washington Irving came in alone with open arms." The friendship of the two famous authors was at once cemented. "Washington Irving is a great fellow," he wrote in a letter to Forster. We have laughed most heartily together. He is just the man he ought to be." Having in his mind's eye painted an ideal picture of him, he could hardly pay his new friend higher tribute than this.

Dickens was only just in time to see him, for Irving had been appointed American minister to Spain, and was on the eve of his departure for Madrid.

But they had many happy meetings, and must have been on the most affectionate terms, for on March 17 Dickens wrote to Forster:

WASHINGTON IRVING ABOUT THE TIME OF HIS FIRST MEETING WITH DICKENS.

Drawn by N. Stein from an engraving by H. Mackie.

Irving was with me at Washington yesterday, and wept heartily at parting. He is a fine fellow, when you know him well; and you would relish him, my dear friend, of all things. We have laughed together at some absurdities we have encountered in company, quite in my vociferous Devonshire-Terrace style. The “Merrikin” Government have treated him, he says, most liberally and handsomely in every respect. He thinks of sailing for Liverpool on the 7th of April; passing a short time in London; and then going to Paris. Perhaps you may meet him. If you do, he will know that you are my dearest friend, and will open his whole heart to you at once.

But this was not to be the final farewell. On March 23, just before his journey from Baltimore to the West, Dickens wrote:

Washington Irving has come in for another leave-taking, and dines with me to-day.

This visit was no doubt in impulsive response to a letter that Dickens had written in Washington on March 21:

My Dear Irving:

We passed through, literally passed through, this place again to-day. I did not come to see you, for I really had not the heart to say good-by again, and felt more than I can tell you when we shook hands last Wednesday.

You will not be at Baltimore, I fear. I thought at the time you only said you might be there to make our parting the gayer.

Wherever you go, God bless you! What pleasure I have had in seeing and talking with you, I will not attempt to say. I shall never forget it as long as I live. What would I give, if we could have but a quiet week together! Spain is a lazy place, and its climate an indolent one. But if you ever have leisure under its sunny skies to think of a man who loves you, and holds communion with your spirit oftener, perhaps, than any other person alive — leisure from listlessness, I mean — and will write to me in London, you will give me an inexpressible amount of pleasure.

Your affectionate friend,
Charles Dickens.

During His second visit to America, when in Washington in 1868, nine years after Irving's death, Dickens, replying to a letter from Mr. Charles Lanman, said in recollection of that final meeting of March 23, 1842:

Your reference to my dear friend Washington Irving renews the vivid impressions reawakened in my mind at Baltimore the other day. I saw his fine face for the last time in that city. He came there to pass a day or two with me there before I went westward, and they were made among the most memorable of my life by his delightful fancy and humor. Some unknown admirer of his books and mine sent to the hotel a most enormous mint julep, wreathed with flowers. We sat, one on either side of it, with great solemnity (it filled a respectably-sized round table), but the solemnity was of short duration. It was quite an enchanted julep, and carried us among innumerable people and places that we both knew. The julep held out far into the night, and my memory never saw him otherwise than as bending over it, with his straw, with an attempted gravity (after some anecdote, involving some wonderfully droll and delicate observation of character) and then, as his eyes caught mine, melting into that captivating laugh of his which was the brightest and best I have ever heard.

Dear sir, with many thanks,

Faithfully yours,

Charles Dickens.

IRVING AT THE GREAT DICKENS DINNER.

After Irving's death Professor Felton, addressing the Massachusetts Historical Society, recalled these bright days, and said:

The time when I saw the most of Mr. Irving was the winter of 1842, during the visit of Charles Dickens in New York. I had known this already distinguished writer in Boston and Cambridge. I had passed much of the time with Mr. Irving and Mr. Dickens, and it was delightful to witness the cordial intercourse of the young man in the flush and glory of his fervent genius, and his elder compeer, then in the assured possession of renown.

Great and rare as was the genius of Mr. Irving, there was one thing he shrank with a comical terror from attempting, and that was "an after-dinner speech." A great dinner, however, was to be given to Mr. Dickens in New York, as one had already been given in Boston, and it was evident to all that no man but Washington Irving could be thought of to preside. With all his dread of making a speech, he was obliged to obey the unusual call, and to accept the painful preeminence. I saw him daily during the interval of preparation, either at the lodgings of Dickens, or at dinner, or at evening parties. I hope I showed no want of sympathy with his forebodings, but I could not help being amused with the tragi-comical distress which the thought of that dinner had caused him. His pleasant humor mingled with the real dread, and played with the whimsical horrors of his own position with an irresistible drollery. Whenever it was alluded to, his invariable answer was, "I shall certainly break down," uttered in half melancholy tones, the ludicrous effect of which it is impossible to describe.

At length the long-expected event arrived; a company of the most eminent persons were assembled, and Mr. Irving took the chair. He had brought the manuscript of his speech, and laid it under his plate. "I shall certainly break down," he repeated over and over again. At last the moment arrived. Mr. Irving rose, and was received with deafening and long-continued applause, which by no means lessened his apprehension. He began in his pleasant voice, got through two or three sentences pretty easily, but in the next hesitated, and, after a few attempts to go on, gave it up, with a graceful allusion to the tournament and the troop of knights all armed and eager for the fray; and ended with the toast: "Charles Dickens, the guest of the nation!"

"There," said he, as he resumed his seat amid applause as great as had greeted his rising, "there! I told you I should break down and I've done it I"

In the "American Notes," published after his return to England, Dickens, referring to a Presidential reception at Washington, said that nothing impressed him so much as the welcome accorded to Washington Irving — my dear friend who had recently been appointed minister at the court of Spain, and who was among them that night, in his new character, for the first and last time, before going abroad. I saw them turning with one mind from noisy orators and officers of state, and flocking with a generous and honest impulse round the man of quiet pursuits; proud in his promotion as reflecting upon their country; and grateful to him with their whole hearts for the store of graceful fancies he had poured out amongst them. Long may he dispense such treasures with unsparing hand; and long may they remember him as worthily!

The friends never met again, but they held each other in their heart of hearts, and corresponded until the day of Irving's death.

The portrait of Dickens on page 487, engraved from a drawing made in 1842, the year of his first visit to America, appeared in Mr. F. G. Kitton's monumental work, "Charles Dickens, By Pen and Pencil." Would that I could produce a picture of the two friends, whose names are enshrined amongst the immortals, as they sat together over that historic mint julep!

CHARLES DICKENS'S RELIGION

From: The Spectator, December 6, 1902, p.891-892

IT may be said at once by some that the religion of a man, even though he be dead, is a matter sacred to himself and to those yet surviving to whom he was most near and dear; and it may be said by others that there is no reason why any words about Charles Dickens's religious views should be of any use today. It seems to one person, however — and the same thought may be shared by others — that at a time when much is being said about education and religion, and the meaning of the words “religious education,” it may be of some service to set forth what religion meant to so unbiased, unprejudiced a mind as that of Dickens. He is not here and now being considered as a writer, a humourist, a plot-maker, but merely as a man who won in his day great popularity (by no unworthy means), had many friends while he was living and has many admirers now that he is dead, and who will be allowed by all, even by those who do not love his pathos, to have promoted kindly feeling among people and to have left the world in some ways better than he found it. If cleanliness of word and thought is one of the signs of “pure and undefiled religion,” as some think, it must be granted that this sign appears in all his books. Thackeray was giving utterance to what many other parents must have felt before and since he spoke when he thanked Charles Dickens for the “unsullied page” of - David Copperfield.”

Dickens, possibly, was not what would be called a decidedly “religious” man. He may not have had a passion for Church services and sermons, he may have had no great liking for the Athanasian Creed as a thing to be said by simple yokels or chanted by little boys in surplices, but religion was for him a very real thing. He had a creed that might be called a useful and a “working” creed, a handy thing for a man of so busy and so strenuous a life. It is not the intention of the writer of these lines to criticise the lovers of what may be called minute points of ritual and complicated creeds, but it is intended to put in a plea for the usefulness and beauty of a religion which is simple. Educationists, whether interested in Church schools or in others, cannot in their hearts be very proud of the results of education during the past thirty years, whether those results are judged by the deeds of many youths or by what may be called the general conversation of the streets that assaults the ears of passers-by. It is not the talk of “loafers” that is here spoken of, but the talk of many who are known as “working men.” The talk is often blasphemous or filthy, or it may be both; the words, probably, are “idle” words, the speakers not caring or realising what they say. This page is not a pulpit, and the fact, for fact it is, is here brought forward to suggest that such conversation is not, either from an intellectual or moral point of view, a satisfactory result of the education, religious and otherwise, that has been talked of and been practised for the last thirty years.

Ideas as to the nature of Charles Dickens’s religious views may be gathered doubtless from his books, but his own statements in letters to his friends may be more certain guides. Writing in 1841 to a Dissenting minister, he says, with the liberality of view which would be natural to him: “There are more roads to heaven, I am inclined to think, than any sect believes; but there can be none which have not these flowers [detestation of cruelty, &c] garnishing the way.” Writing in the same year to a bereaved man, he observes: “You have already all the comfort that I could lay before you; all, I hope, that the affectionate spirit of your brother, now in happiness, can shed into your soul.” “Try, do try,” he says in the same year to another mourner, “to think that they have but preceded you to happiness, and will meet you with joy in heaven.” If Dickens was not devoted to the English Church, he did not for that reason love Nonconformists merely because they did not love the Church. One letter gives an account of a meeting at a funeral with a minister who may have sat unconsciously for a photograph of Mr. Chadband. This preacher said of a certain statement: “It is false, incorrect, unchristian, in a manner blasphemous, and in all respects contemptible. Let us pray.” Such remarks might have been made by Mr. Chadband.

On the other hand, in a letter to Mr. Macvey Napier written in 1843, Dickens showed no fondness for what may be called Church schools : — “Would it meet the purposes of the Review [the Edinburgh] to come out strongly against any system of education based exclusively on the principles of the Established Church? If it would, I should like to show why such a thing as the Church Catechism is wholly inapplicable to the state of ignorance that now prevails; and why no system but one, so general in great religious principles as to include all creeds, can meet the wants and understandings of the dangerous classes of society.” After some remarks about the “ragged schools,” he adds: — “I could show these people in a state so miserable and so neglected, that their very nature rebels against the simplest religion, and that to convey to them the faintest outlines of any system of distinction between right and wrong is in itself a giant’s task, before which mysteries and squabbles for forms must give way. Would this be too much for the Review?”

Turning back for a moment to his views about the other world, we find him in 1855, after referring to “A Journey from this World to the Next,” comforting a mother with these words: — “With no effort of the fancy, with nothing to undo, you will always be able to think of the pretty creature you have lost, as a child in heaven.” Certain Blue-books of great interest have lately brought before the notice of all England the principles and practice of education in America; from Baltimore Charles Dickens wrote in 1842: — “I am disappointed. This is not the republic I came to see j this is not the republic of my imagination. I infinitely prefer a liberal monarchy — even with its sickening accompaniments of court circulars — to such a government as this In everything of which it has made a boast — excepting its education of the people and its care for poor children [the italics are not in the original] — it sinks immeasurably below the level I had placed it upon,”

That Dickens was not very fond of missionary societies is a fact that might be gathered from his placing “Jo” upon the steps of a building tenanted by such a society, whose officers had no work for Jo and such as Jo; but his ideas are clearly stated in a letter written in the course of 1852: “I am decidedly of opinion that the two works, the home and the foreign, are not conducted with an equal hand, and that the home claim is by far the stronger and the more pressing of the two.” After insisting that education of all kinds should begin at home, and “on the utter removal of neglected and untaught childhood from its [i.e., England’s] streets,” he adds: “If it steadily persist in this work, working downward to the lowest, the travellers of all grades whom it sends abroad will be good, exemplary, practical missionaries, instead of undoers of what the best professed missionaries can do.” Experience taught him that information was not always imparted in a seductive form, even when both the teacher and the taught were adults.

Writing in 1854, he tells Frank Stone about a certain man “who has read every book that ever was written, and is a perfect gulf of information. Before exploding a mine of knowledge he has a habit of closing one eye and wrinkling up his nose, so that he seems perpetually to be taking aim at you and knocking you over with a terrific charge. Then he looks again, and takes another aim. So you are always on your back, with your legs in the air.” That learned man has spiritual descendants in these days! It has been seen what was Dickens’s theory about mission work: namely, that every Englishman going out into the world — especially to other countries — should carry Christianity with him, or, rather, in him.

It is interesting to see, then, what was the sort of equipment that he provided for his own children, so far as it is set forth in these letters. Writing in 1868 to one son who was about to start his undergraduate life at Cambridge, after giving excellent advice about the management of money, candour, debt, and reminding the son of the father’s own hard work, Charles Dickens adds: — ” As your brothers have gone away one by one I have written to each of them what I am now going to write to you. You know that you have never been hampered with religious forms of restraint, and that with mere unmeaning forms I have no sympathy. But I most strongly and affectionately impress upon you the priceless value of the New Testament, and the study of that book as the one unfailing guide in life. Deeply respecting it, and bowing down before the character of our Saviour, as separated from the vain constructions and inventions of men, you cannot go very wrong, and will always preserve at heart a true spirit of veneration, and humility. Similarly I impress upon you the habit of saying a Christian prayer every night and morning. These things have stood by me all though my life, and remember that I tried to render the New Testament intelligible to you and lovable by you when you were a mere baby.”

The present writer has had the privilege, the great privilege, of reading that essence of the New Testament, so to call it, in its original MS., — it never has been published, and it never will be so long as the wishes of its compiler are respected. A letter of the same tenor was written to a son who went abroad in 1868, and unless our memory is playing tricks, Charles Dickens made in his last will and testament a like statement as to creed. It is possible that this collection of his views on education and religion may be of some interest and some use to-day.

CHARLES DICKENS IN ILLINOIS

By Dr. J.F. Snyder

From: Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society, October 1910, p.7-22

A highly prized volume in my library is an old, stained copy of the first American edition of the Pickwick Papers, (published by Carey, Lea & Blanchard, Philadelphia, 1838), which my father gave me in 1841. Beading and re-reading that book with boyish delight during the school vacation of that summer interested me in its author, known then as "Boz," a nom de plume he had adopted early in his literary career. He was already famous out here, so that when the eastern papers announced his contemplated visit to the United States the next year, I shared with our people generally the hope and expectancy that he would extend his tour as far west as the Mississippi, which he subsequently did. No railroad had then penetrated the wilderness as far as St. Louis, at that time the frontier city of the vast west, and steamboats and stage coaches were about the only means for public transportation west of the Allegheny mountains. Mr. Dickens, accompanied by his wife, came by the old emigrant route, in steamboats, down the Ohio river from Pittsburg, and up the Mississippi, arriving at St. Louis on the 11th of April, 1842.

The steamboat Fulton, upon which Mr. and Mrs. Dickens had taken passage at Louisville, Ky., arrived at St. Louis in the evening (of the 11th), but as it was not expected until the next day, no reception committee appeared to meet the distinguished tourists, and they made their way, in a hack, to the Planters House, then by far the finest hotel west of the Mississippi, where they were regally entertained. When their arrival became known, the citizens of St. Louis spared neither pains nor expense in pressing upon them every social attention and the most cordial hospitality during their stay.

Mr. Dickens having expressed — as he says in his American Notes — “a great desire to see a prairie before turning back from the furthest point of my wanderings; and as some gentlemen of the town had, in their hospitable consideration, an equal desire to gratify me, a day was fixed before my departure, for an expedition to the Looking Glass Prairie, which is within thirty miles of the town.” Friday, April 15, was the day selected for the excursion, and the 13th chapter of his Notes is devoted to the description of that “Jaunt to the Looking Glass Prairie and Back.”

Beside Mr. Dickens and the drivers of the four teams, there were nine men — and no ladies — in the party, only two of whom I could identify and can now remember. These were John J. Anderson, a banker, and George Knapp, of the Missouri Republican. They were all young men connected with the newspapers and business interests of St. Louis, bent upon affording their famous guest a glimpse of the grandeur of Illinois, the “two large baskets and two large demi-johns,” with ice and other extras, taken along, indicating the picnic aspect of the “jaunt,” and intent to make it as pleasant for him as possible. Seated in the several conveyances with one of their number on horseback as guide, they crossed the Mississippi in the early morning on one of the Wiggins Company ferry boats. At that season of the year the miry road across the seven miles of soft loamy soil of the American Bottom, and the succeeding seven miles of sticky clay uplands to Belleville, usually rendered traveling over it slow and difficult, and was, in fact, at times almost impassable.

To make matters worse, a heavy rain had fallen the night before, filling the chuck-holes in the road full of water, and further diluting the already deep mud. “We had a pair of very strong horses,” says Mr. Dickens in his Notes, “but traveled at the rate of little more than a couple of miles an hour, through one unbroken slough of black mud and water. It had no variety but in depth. Now it was only half over the wheels, now it hid the axletree, and now the coach sank down in it almost to the windows.” This description of traveling over that part of the great National Road at that day is not greatly overdrawn. But Mr. Dickens failed to notice the topography of that region further on, or forgot it in the two years transpiring between his visit and the publication of his American Notes, as, after leaving the French Village at the foot of the bluffs where the road ascends to an elevation of a hundred feet, he says: “We went forward again, through mud and mire, and damp and festering heat, and brake and bush, attended always by the music of the frogs and pigs, until nearly noon, when we halted at a place called Belleville, * * * a small collection of wooden houses, huddled together in the very heart of the bush and swamp.” His memory of the continuation of mud all the way was certainly correct, but Belleville, situated on high rolling ground far removed from sloughs and swamps, was even then a flourishing, pretentious town containing quite a number of business houses and handsome residences substantially built of brick and stone. There was then no telegraph to apprise the Belleville people of the great novelist’s coming, or of his arrival at St. Louis, and but few of them knew that he had honored our town by his presence until the next issue of the weekly paper. Two years later, 1844, the first telegraph line to reach St. Louis was constructed by the O’Reiley Company alongside of the old stage road from Vincennes, with the wire fastened by insulators to the trees where it passed through the timber, and crossed the Mississippi from the top of a tall mast at Illinoistown (now East St. Louis) to a similar one on Bloody Island, and from there to the top of the shot tower near the Belcher sugar refinery on the other side.

Returning home, at about eleven o’clock in the forenoon of that 15th day of April, from an errand upon which I had been sent to the eastern part of the village, I had reached the public square when the line of carriages came pulling through the mud up Main street from the west. In doubt as to whether they formed a funeral procession, or transported some kind of show, I stopped to see them pass by. Just then Philip B. Fouke, editor of the Belleville Advocate, and in later years our Congressman, came down the street to the court house, and I asked him who those traveling strangers were. He had, a few minutes before, interviewed the horseman who had arrived in advance of them to have luncheon prepared for the party, and was hurrying into the court house — circuit court being in session — to inform the bench and bar the object and purpose of the novel expedition that had excited my curiosity. Startled by hearing that Boz, the author of the Pickwick Papers, was actually there, I turned about and, keeping abreast of the front carriage, followed it up the street until it stopped at the door of the Mansion House. On the way I was joined by several other boys, my daily associates, not one of whom perhaps had ever heard of Charles Dickens, but attracted by the unusual appearance of so many strange vehicles, went along gazing at them with open-mouthed wonder.

When the barouche conveying Mr. Dickens halted at the curbstone, he was the first of its four inmates to step from it to the sidewalk, and did so with a look of evident relief. It was a perfect day “overhead,” warm for the middle of April, with clear sky and the refreshing air of early spring. The landlord, Mr. McBride, came bustling out, bareheaded, to receive the company, and was introduced to the famous writer by one of his traveling companions. The man introduced as “Mr. Dickens” was (to me) a disappointing surprise. In fact, my youthful ideal of the genius who created Mr. Pickwick, Sam Weller and the Widow Bardell, was badly shattered. It is natural for the average man — woman or boy — when hearing much about any noted individual, to form a definite idea of that person’s appearance; or, upon reading an interesting book to draw an imaginary portrait of its author. Mr. Dickens was, on that day, a very ordinary looking man indeed, with no external indication of true greatness. In the estimation of “us boys” he compared very unfavorably with Col. Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, the slayer of Tecumseh, and late Vice President, who had, a short time before, visited Belleville, and had been given a grand reception with brass band accompaniment.

Mr. Dickens was at that time 30 years of age, of medium size — about 5 feet, 8 or 9 inches tall — square shouldered, erect, and well proportioned in figure, weighing (probably) 140 pounds. His complexion was not of the usual ruddy English cast; his eyes were brown, and dark, slightly curling hair surmounted a broad forehead and smoothly shaved face, then sunburned and mosquito bitten, but none too handsome at best. With the license of conscious superiority he dressed very carelessly, and on this occasion, incased in a common linen coat and coarse straw hat bound around with green ribbon, he attracted some public attention, but certainly ran no risk of being mistaken by strangers for either General Scott or Daniel Webster. He was not very talkative, but when he spoke his voice was soft and pleasant, with clear and distinct pronounciation of every word. He seldom laughed, but his frequent smile was expressive of his keen sense of humor, and appreciation of his novel surroundings. There was about his countenance a cynical expression; but no affectation perceptible in his speech or manners, yet every movement and gesture plainly indicated that he regarded the homage paid him by our simple people as justly his due, and that any courteous acknowledgement of it on his part would be an unwarranted condescension.

On this part of his American tour the memoranda he jotted down, from day to day, of transpiring events and objects and persons that interested him, must have been brief and disconnected, as his published Notes bear internal evidence of having been written out some time after his return to England, with many passages supplied by memory. And his memory of many things he tells of, unaided by his notes made at the time, was often at fault and much confused.

His description of Belleville, as being “in the very heart of the bush and swamp,” is an instance of this. Of the Belleville houses he further says, “Many of them had singularly bright doors of red and yellow, for the place had been lately visited by a traveling painter, ‘who got along,’ as I was told, by ‘eating his way.’” When this was written he drew upon his memory alone, it having retained an indistinct impression of the sloughs and lakes of the American Bottom, and the French Village, through which he passed and of Belleville, all mixed up together. The old French Village, at the foot of the bluffs, it is true, had recently been visited by a tramping painter who left the impress of his art on several gaudily colored doors in that vicinity, but he had not yet “eaten his way” through, or to, our town.

The sarcasm in Mr. Dicken’s account of his “Jaunt to the Looking Glass Prairie,” though pungent and stinging, is, in the main, amusing, in some instances just, but as often totally devoid of wit or humor, amounting simply to willful malignant, misrepresentation actuated by an animus difficult to comprehend. At the time of his arrival in Belleville, he says, “The criminal court was sitting, and was at that moment trying some criminals for horse stealing. * * * The horses belonging to the bar, the judge, and witnesses were tied to temporary racks set up roughly in the road, by which it is to be understood a forest path, nearly knee-deep in mud and slime.” True the circuit court was then in session, with Sidney Breese on the bench, Wm. H. Underwood, the prosecuting attorney, Wm. C. Kinney, the circuit clerk and Sam. B. Chandler, sheriff. The bar attending that court comprised Lyman Trumbull, Gustavus Koerner, James Shields, Joseph Gillespie, U. F. Linder, N. Niles, Wm. H. Bissell, P. B. Fouke and Governor John Reynolds,

His “forest path” was the public square in the middle of the town, just as it now is, excepting the paving and buildings it then contained. Northeast of its center was the fine old brick court house, and across the street, to the west, the two-story brick offices of the county officials. Fronting that on the south was the new market, also of brick, and on the opposite corner, facing the court house, was the public well. There were hitch racks on the east and north of the court house, and — we may as well admit also — some mud in the streets, as usual in the spring months.

The “Mansion House,” on the northeast corner of Main and High streets, is still there. Solid and substantial, tho a dingy-looking relic of a past age in the midst of modern progress, it is yet (1910) serviceable as a business house, and, with pride, is pointed out to strangers, by the older residents as the hostelry where Mr. Dickens was entertained in 1842. Of it he says, “There was an hotel in this place, * * * an odd shambling, low-roofed outhouse, half cow shed and half kitchen, with a coarse brown canvas table cloth, and tin sconces stuck against the walls, to hold candles at supper time.” The Mansion House was really a large, roomy brick building, fully up to date in all respects, two stories high, with long two-story frame addition, erected only three years before, by Rev. Thomas Harrison, and was well arranged, well furnished and conducted in firstclass style by his daughter and her husband, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. J. McBride.

Mr. Dickens and companions on arrival were escorted by the landlord up stairs to rooms provided with water, towels, etc., where they might perform their ablutions and “dress for dinner,” and the carriages, from which the horses were unhitched and taken to the stable, were left standing in front of the hotel.

Court having adjourned for the noon recess, Colonel Niles, Governor Koerner, Phil Fouke and two or three other members of the bar, with several citizens, came up to the Mansion House to pay their respects to the famous guest. Judge Breese and Jo. Gillespie declined to accompany them.

With boyish curiosity, and eagerness to see all that was going on, I followed Mr. Dickens — unasked and no doubt unwanted — to the foot of the stairs, and waited there until he came down and was introduced to the lawyers and some of the other visitors. I was in close proximity to his coat tail when he was presented to “Dr. Crocus,” and was an interested witness to that interview, which, as narrated in the XIII chapter of the American Notes, is substantially correct, with the exception that the landlord, Mr. McBride, was not addressed as “Colonel.” He was a quiet, unobtrusive, upright man, an exemplary citizen and rigid Methodist, but not a colonel. The man portrayed as “Dr. Crocus” was an adventurer calling himself Dr. Angus Melrose — perhaps an assumed name — who had, a few months before, alighted in Belleville as a lecturer on phrenology, then a very popular fad, and incidentally offering his professional services for the healing of all known diseases.

To Mr. Dickens' question, "Do you think of soon returning to the old country?" Dr. Melrose answered, "Not yet awhile, sir, not yet. You won't catch me at that just yet, sir. I am a little too fond of freedom for that, sir. Ha, ha! It's not so easy for a man to tear himself from a free country such as this is, sir. Ha, ha! No, no! Ha, ha! None of that till one's obliged to do it, sir. No, no!" In this grandiloquent declaration the Doctor was very evidently — as Mr. Dickens intimated — "playing to the galleries," but he also intended Mr. Dickens to understand that he was speaking ironically and, by innuendo, expressing his contempt for American institutions. With proverbial English obtuseness of perception, however, Mr. Dickens failed to catch the Doctor's covert meaning.

Dr. Melrose was over six feet in height, and robust in proportion, with florid face and long nose. Of friendly, social disposition he was a fluent talker, speaking correct English with broad Scotch accent. To Mr. McBride he stated that he had recently graduated in medicine at the Edinburgh University, and having but limited means, to gratify his desire to see America, he had recourse to the lecture platform, phrenology, and the practice of medicine to defray expenses of touring the country. He remained in Belleville several months, but tho immortalized as "Dr. Crocus" by the American Notes, very few persons now living retain the slightest recollection of him.

For half an hour or more Mr. Dickens was surrounded by a throng of citizens, to several of whom he was formally introduced, but to none of whom he addressed anything more than curt, commonplace remarks. It was plain that he was both bored and amused by the curiosity and evident disappointment of the crowd inspecting him, and seemed glad when the dinner bell ended the impromptu reception. The glimpse obtained of him from the open dining room door, when all were seated at the long table, left no doubt as to the ample justice he was doing to the "chicken fixings" specially prepared for him. Dinner over he strolled out on the sidewalk in front of the hotel, viewing the part of town in the range of his vision, while conversing with his St. Louis friends until the horses were brought from the stable and all was ready to move on again.

“From Belleville,” says Mr. Dickens, “we went on through the same desolate kind of waste, and constantly attended, without the interval of a moment, by the same music” (the croaking of bullfrogs). Here again, with the American Bottom vaguely in mind, he drew upon his memory and it failed him. The road from Belleville to Lebanon — then almost the entire twelve miles through dense woods, broken here and there by the farms of Governor Kinney and other old settlers — is over high, undulating and beautiful country, remote from sloughs or swamps or other habitats of the festive mosquito or musical frog.

The hotel at Lebanon was more fortunate than the one in our town in catching the fancy of the great novelist, and he accorded it this dubious praise, “In point of cleanliness and comfort, it would have suffered by no comparison with any English ale house, of a homely kind, in England.” It was a large barn-like frame building, called the Mermaid Hotel, with a large square sign on a tall post, in front, on which was painted a full-sized mermaid standing on her tail on the waves, holding a looking glass before her with one hand, and combing her long golden tresses with the other. The house was owned and conducted as an inn and stage stand by Capt. Lyman Adams, a retired New England sea captain, of kind and genial disposition, who ended his days there, highly respected and esteemed by all who knew him.

The interest of Mr. Dickens’ visit to Illinois culminates in his impressions and description of the prairie, the objective point of his “jaunt,” thus recounted in his Notes, “It would be difficult to say why or how — though it was possible from having heard and read so much about it — but the effect on me was disappointment. Looking towards the setting sun, there lay, stretched out before my view, a vast expanse of level ground, unbroken, save by one thin line of trees, which scarcely amounted to a scratch upon the great blank; until it met the glowing sky, wherein it seemed to dip, mingling with its rich colors, and mellowing in its distant blue. There it lay, a tranquil sea or lake without water, if such a simile be admissible, with the day going down upon it; a few birds wheeling here and there, and solitude and silence reigning paramount around. But the grass was not yet high; there were bare, black patches on the ground; and the few wild flowers that the eye could see were poor and scanty. Great as the picture was, its very flatness and extent, which left nothing to the imagination, tamed it down and cramped its interest. I felt little of that sense of freedom and exhilaration which a Scotch heath inspired or even our English downs awaken. It was lonely and wild, but oppressive in its barren monotony. I felt that in traversing the prairies I could never abandon myself to the scene, forgetful of all else, as I should do instinctively were the heather underneath my feet, or an iron-bound coast beyond; but should often glance towards the distant and frequently receding line of the horizon, and wish it gained and passed. It is not a scene to be forgotten, but it is scarcely one, I think (at all events, as I saw it) to remember with much pleasure or to covet the looking on again in after life.”

Immediately following this is his account of the sunset lunch that was eaten, which the great writer seems to have enjoyed much more and remembered better than his view of the prairie. “We encamped,” he goes on to say, “near a solitary log house, for the sake of its water, and dined upon the plain. The baskets contained roast fowls, buffalo tongue (an exquisite dainty, by the way), ham, bread, cheese and butter, biscuits, champagne, sherry, lemons and sugar for punch, and abundance of rough ice. The meal was delicious and the entertainers were the soul of kindness and good humor. I have often recalled that cheerful party to my pleasant recollection since, and shall not easily forget, in junketing nearer home with friends of older date, my boon companions on the prairie.”

There is a discrepancy in the prairie scene drawn by Mr. Dickens difficult to reconcile, excepting upon the grave suspicion that the “champagne, sherry, lemons and sugar for punch” must have operated as a disturbing element in his vision and memory. “Looking towards the setting sun,” he says, “there lay stretched out before my view a vast expanse of level ground with the day going down upon it.” Now, from Lebanon Mr. Dickens and party traveled almost directly east, a mile through the timber, and about a mile into the prairie to that “solitary cabin.” They were then on the western border of the prairie. From that point, therefore, in looking over that “vast expanse of level ground,” the setting sun was behind them. The time was sunset, and had Mr. Dickens been “looking towards the setting sun,” as he says, he would have seen no “vast expanse of level ground,” but instead only a half mile slope down to the rivulet and a corresponding half mile ascent on the other side up to the Silver creek timber surrounding Lebanon. In looking over the prairie his face was turned to the east, and the sun was sinking in the forest behind him. Nor is there any expanse of level land there, no prairie in Illinois having more perfect natural drainage than Looking Glass.

A few years later, when a student at McKendree College, I paid several visits to that “solitary cabin,” made historic by Mr. Dickens’ champagne dinner, and his first and only view of our prairies. The cabin long since disappeared, and its site, made memorable by the pen and presence of the author of Pickwick and David Copperfield, is lost in the mazes of endless corn fields.

Mr. Dickens perhaps wrote his candid impression of the prairie as it appeared to him; but his disparaging description of “a level plain,” with the sun setting in the east, written many months later, warrants the belief that in that sketch he again relied altogether upon his capricious memory.

Looking Glass Prairie, in fact, at that time presented as charming a landscape as could be found in the prairie region of Illinois. It was merely one of the many prolongations, or offsets, of the grand treeless plain extending north and east beyond the limits of the State. Framed around, on the west and north, by the wooded hills of Silver Creek, and by the timbered line of Sugar Creek to the east and south, eight miles away, it presented to the eye, from the site of that “solitary log cabin,” a magnificent panorama of undulating plain diversified with isolated groves and brush-fringed rivulets. Seen as Mr. Dickens saw it — and as I first saw it — in its virgin freshness, undefiled by the plow, or yet marred by the embellishments of civilization, it was one of nature’s finest rural gems, fascinating in interest and wild sublimity.

After dining on the prairie, Mr. Dickens and party returned to Lebanon and passed the night at the Mermaid Hotel. The next morning he arose at 5:00 o’clock and, after a short walk about the village, returned to the tavern and amused himself for some time in the inspection of its public rooms and back yard, which seems to have afforded him more genuine enjoyment than his view of the prairie.

In his narrative of the “jaunt to Looking Glass Prairie and back,” he only mentions the topography of the country he saw to misrepresent and vilify it, and is silent regarding its productions, resources and future possibilities. But he describes in detail an old whisky-soaked settler of the backwoods type, and devotes an entire page to his interview with the tramping Scotch doctor, and more space to a pen picture of the Lebanon tavern and its stable yard than to the prairie he came specially to see. He was much impressed by the sight of a tailor's shop on wheels, and brightly painted front doors, and the moving of a small frame house down the street from one locality to another, but makes no mention of those noted pioneer institutions of learning, McKendree College, at Lebanon, and Rev. John M. Peck's Rock Spring Seminary, three miles west of Lebanon, both very conspicuous objects by the roadside along which he journeyed.

In full sight of the spot where the party dined on the plain, and less than a mile away, stands Emerald Mound, the most prominent landmark of the prairie, one of the finest and most perfect of all the earthen monuments of the aborigines in the State. This remarkable vestige of a vanished prehistoric people is well calculated to attract the attention and interest of any intelligent foreign (or native) tourist; but not a word did Mr. Dickens write about it. He could not well have failed to see it, and that he did see it is confirmed by his trivial notice of its more majestic contemporaneous structure, the great Cahokia mound, near which he passed when returning to St. Louis by the upper, or more direct, road.

Of that wonderful work he merely says, "Looming in the distance, as we rode along, was another of the ancient Indian burial places, called the Monks' Mound in memory of a body of fanatics of the order of La Trappe, who founded a desolate convent there many years ago, when there were no settlers within a thousand miles, and were all swept off by the pernicious climate — in which lamentable fatality few rational people will suppose, perhaps, that society experienced any very severe deprivation."

Mr. Dickens does not mention, in his Notes, the name of any one of the young men who took him over to Illinois to see the prairie; nor did he write one word expressive of gratitude for their generosity in leaving their business and providing lavishly, free of all expense to him, everything necessary to conduce to his pleasure and satisfaction in that excursion. It seems that a sense of ordinary courtesy would have prompted him to at least return some slight public acknowledgment of that obligation.

Cairo was the only other locality in Illinois visited by Mr. Dickens. To see Cairo was really the main object of his journey to America. In 1837 one Darius B. Holbrook, a shrewd Boston Yankee, organized the Cairo City and Canal Company, a scheme as audaciously illusive as John Law's Mississippi Bubble of 1718; and going to Europe he plastered the walls everywhere there with flaming lithographs of a grand city at the junction of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers — in fact as mythical as the fabled Quivira of Coronado 's search. In London was the banking house of John Wright & Co. — the same that, in 1839, confided the Illinois Fund Commissioners, Governor Reynolds, Senator Young, General Rawlings and Colonel Oakley, into depositing with them $1,000,000 of Illinois bonds, resulting in a loss to the State of half their value. Through John Wright & Co., Holbrook actually sold bonds of his Cairo company to the amount of $2,000,000. Among his numerous victims was Mr. Dickens, who, it is asserted, invested in those bonds a large part of his slender means.

A few years later, becoming, with other investors, suspicious of the flaunted magnificence of the American Cairo, Mr. Dickens concluded to satisfy himself by a personal inspection of it. He came, and thus described what he saw: "At length, upon the morning of the third day, we arrived at a spot so much more desolate than any we had yet beheld, that the forlornest places we had passed were, in comparison with it, full of interest. At the junction of the two rivers, on ground so flat and low and marshy that at certain seasons of the year it is inundated to the house-tops, lies a breeding place of fever, ague and death, vaunted in England as a mine of Golden Hope, and speculated in, on the faith of monstrous representations, to many people's ruin. A dismal swamp, on which the half-built houses rot away; cleared here and there for the space of a few yards, and teeming then with rank unwholesome vegetation, in whose baleful shade the wretched wanderers who are tempted hither, droop and die, and lay their bones; the hateful Mississippi circling and eddying before it, and turning off upon its southern course a slimy monster hideous to behold; a hotbed of disease, an ugly sepulchre, a grave uncheered by any gleam of promise; a place without one single quality, in earth or air or water, to commend it; such is this dismal Cairo."

This crushing disappointment and shocking dissipation of his cherished dreams of golden profits accounts for Mr. Dickens' malignant defamation of everything he saw west of Louisville, and explains the venom in his satirical novel that soon followed, entitled "Martin Chuzzlewit," in which he wreaks his vengeance upon the United States generally, and upon Cairo particularly under the pseudonym of "Eden."

PICKWICKIAN BATH

By Percy Fitzgerald

From: The Gentleman's Magazine, May 1898, p.491-506

BATH, which already owed so much to famous writers, owes even more to “Boz,” the genial author of “Pickwick” — a book which has so much increased the gaiety of the nation. The scenes at the old city are more minute and vivid than any yet offered. But if it owed much to “Boz,” it repaid him by furnishing him with a name for his book which has gone over the world. Everything about this name will be interesting; and it is not generally known when and how “Boz” obtained it.

There was a small hamlet some few miles from Bath and 97 from London — which is 106 miles away from Bath — bearing the name of “Pickwick.” The Bath coach, by the way, started from the White Horse Cellars, Piccadilly, at half-past seven in the morning, and took just twelve hours for the journey. Now it is made by the Great Western in two! Here many years ago, at the time of the story, was “Pickwick House, the seat of C. N. Loscombe, Esq.,” and also “Pickwick Lodge,” where dwelt Captain Fenton. “Boz” had never seen or heard of such places, but all the same they indirectly furnished him with the name. A mail-coach guard found an infant on the road in this place, and gave it the name of “Pickwick.” The word “Pickwick” contains the common terminal “wick,” as in “Warwick”: an affix which means a village or hamlet of some kind. Pickwick, however, has long since disappeared from the face of the map. Probably after the year 1837 folk did not relish dating their letters from a spot of such humorous memories.

This foundling, Eleazar Pickwick, was taken into the service of the coaching hotel, the White Hart, devoted himself to the horse and coaching business, and at the time of “Boz’s” or Mr. Pickwick’s visit, his grandson, Moses, was the actual proprietor of the coaches on the road. “The name,” said Sam, “is not only down on the vay-bill, sir, but they’ve painted vun on ‘em on the door of the coach.” As Sam spoke, he pointed to that part of the door on which the proprietor’s name usually appears, and there sure enough, in gilt letters of a goodly size, was the magic name of Pickwick. “Dear me,” said Mr. Pickwick, quite staggered by the coincidence, “what a very extraordinary thing!” “Yes; but that ain’t all,” said Sam, again directing his master’s attention to the coach-door. “Not content with writin’ up Pickwick, they put ‘Moses’ afore it, which I calls adding insult to injury.” “It’s odd enough, certainly,” said Mr. Pickwick. It may be noted here what an air of reality this imparts, and how unlikely we should be to find such a touch in a modern novel. When he was casting about for a good name for his venture, it recurred to him as having a quaint oddity and uncanniness. And thus it is that we owe to Bath, and to Bath only, this celebrated name. Many years ago, a Mr. Pickwick actually changed his name by public advertisement. This ordinary event caused quite a public sensation. The owner was reminded that it was an old and honourable name — coming originally from Pique vite — and it was not Count Smorltork who suggested this derivation.

In the course of his story, our author having thus to take Mr. Pickwick down to Bath, it occurred to him that the fact that his hero was transported by a coach bearing his own name on the door must have seemed odd to many of his readers, or possibly to the coach proprietor himself. He saw, too, an opening for some goodhumoured fun, and accordingly made Sam call his master’s attention to the matter. No city has had its society and manners sketched by such eminent pens as has Bath — Smollett, Miss Burney, Miss Austen, and “Boz” have all described it. The old walls and houses are thus made to live. “Boz” has given one of the most vivid and vivacious pictures of its expiring glories in the thirties, when there were still “M.C.s,” routs, assemblies, and sedans. His own connection with the place is personal, and a very interesting one. He was there in 1835 on election business, hurrying after Lord John Russell, all over the country, to report his speeches — a young fellow of three-and-twenty, full of “dash,” “go,” and readiness of resource, of immense energy and carelessness of fatigue, ready to go anywhere and do anything. While thus engaged on serious business he kept his eyes wide open, took in all the humours of Bath and noted them in his memory, though he made no use of this till more than two years later, when he was well on into “Pickwick.” Indeed, all “Pickwick” is full of his own personal adventures at this time, Bath and Ipswich particularly contributing a substantial portion of the book.

Entering an old city by night leaves a curious romantic impression, and few old cities gain so much as Bath by this mode of approach. The shadowy houses have a monumental air; the fine streets which we mostly ascend show a mystery, especially as we flit by the open square, under the great black Abbey, which seems a beetling rock. This old Bath mysteriousness seems haunted by the ghosts of Burney, Johnson, Goldsmith, Wilkes, Quin, Thrale, Mr. Pickwick, and dozens more. Fashion and gentility hover round its stately homes. The Parade, North and South, and what adjoins the Parade, Pierrepont Street, of quaint aspect, inspire a sort of awe. The Parade! What an antique twang about the name! And there it is: a genuine thing, and quite ready for company, with its capacious well-flagged promenade. Nothing, too, rouses such ideas of state and dignity as the Palladian Circus. There is a tone of mournful grandeur about it — something forlorn. Had it, in some freak of fashion, been abandoned and suffered, for a time at least, to go to neglect and be somewhat overgrown with moss and foliage, it would pass for some grand Roman ruin. There is a solemn greyish gloom about it; the grass in the enclosure is rank, long, and deep green.

Pulteney Street, too: what a state and nobility there is about it! So wide and so spacious; the houses with an air of grand solidity — no carvings or frittering work, but relying on their fine lines and proportion. To lodge there is an education, and the impression remains with one as of a sense of personal dignity from dwelling in such large and lofty chambers, grandly laid out with noble stairs and the like. The builders in this fine city would seem to have been born architects; nearly all the houses have claims to distinction, each has an expression and feeling of its own. The mellow blackened or browned tint adds to the effect. The mouldings are full of reserve, and chastened — suited exactly to the material. There is something, too, very stately about Laura Place, which opens on it.

From this point of view, Bath is a far more interesting city than Edinburgh.¹ Mr. Peach has written two most interesting little quartos on the “Historic Houses of Bath”; and Mr. Meehan, a well read bookseller, has compiled an admirable hand list or guide to these notable residences.

I don’t know anything more strange and agreeable than the feeling of promenading these Parades, North and South — a feeling compounded of awe, reverence, and exciting interest. The tranquil repose and dignity of these low, solid houses, the broad flagged Promenade, the unmistakable air of old fashion, the sort of reality and self-persuasion that they might in a moment be re-peopled with all these eminent persons — much as “Boz” called up the ghosts of the old mail-coach passengers in his telling ghost story — the sombre grey of the walls, the brightness of the windows: these elements join to leave an extraordinary impression. The houses on these Parades are charming from their solid proportions, adapted, as it were, to the breadth of the Parade. I always admire their compact, compressed, unpretending, yet substantial build, recalling the old Bruges mansions. Execrable, by the way, are the modern attempts seen side by side — feeble and incapable, not attempting any expression at all; extraordinary are the helplessness and lack of purpose which we find in our modern times. There is a row of meagre tenements beside the Abbey — attempts at pinnacled gables — which it is a sorrowful thing to look on, so cheap and starved is it. Even the newer shops in places like Milsom Street, with nothing to do but to copy what is before them, show the same platitude. Here and there you are constantly coming upon one of these beautifully designed old mansions piteously disguised, cut up in two or three it may be, or the lower portion fashioned into a shop. These have been well described by Mr. Peach.

1 Mr. T. Sturge Cotterell has prepared a singularly interesting map of Bath, in which all the spots honoured by the residence of famous visitors are marked down. It is very extraordinary the number and distinction of these personages.

No group of architectural objects is more effective or touches one more nearly than the buildings gathered round the Baths. There is something quaint and old-fashioned in the arrangement, and I am never tired of coming back to the pretty open colonnade, the faded yet dignified Pump-room, with the ambitious hotel and the solemn Abbey rising solemnly behind. Then there is the delightful Promenade opposite, under the arcades — a genuine bit of old fashion — under whose arches the capricious Fanny Burney often strolled. Everything about this latter conglomeration — the shape of the ground, and even the older portion of the municipal buildings, with their elegant decorations, sculptured garlands, &c. — bespeak the influence of the graceful Adam, whose pupil or imitator Mr. Baldwin may have been.

“Boz’s” description of the tarnished Pump-room answers to what is seen now, save as to the tone of the decorations. I say “Boz’s,” for Pickwick, it should be recollected, was not actually acknowledged by the author under his proper name. It was thought that the well-known and popular “Boz” of the “Sketches” would attract far more than the obscure C. Dickens. Now “Boz” and the Sketches have receded and are little thought of. “Boz” and Pickwick go far better together than do Dickens and Pickwick. There is an old-fashioned solemnity over this Pump-room which speaks of the classical taste over a hundred years ago. How quaint and suitable is the inscription “Apitrrrov fiiv Hup” in the faded gilt characters. It is exactly suited — as to proportions — to its place. Within it is one stately chamber, not altered a bit since the day, fifty-three years ago, that “Boz strolled in and wrote his description. As I sat with a friend beside me in the newly finished concert-room, which is in happy keeping, I called up the old genial Pickwick promenading about under the direction of Bantam, M.C., and the genial tone of the old gaiety and good spirits. There is still to be seen the ugly Tompion clock (Tompion was a maker of celebrity) and the statue of Nash, M.C., in his niche, and the inscriptions, and the visitors’ book, and the bar with the row of glasses.

This “Tompion Clock,” which is carefully noted by “Boz,” seems to have been always regarded as a sort of monument. It is like an overgrown eight-day clock, without any adornment and plain to a degree — no doubt relying upon its Tompion works. It is in exactly the same place as it was sixty years ago, and goes with the old regularity. Nay, for that matter, it stands where it did a hundred years ago — in the old recess by Nash’s statue and inscription, and was no doubt ordered at the opening of the rooms. In an old account of Bath, at the opening of the century, attention is called to the Tompion clock with a sort of pride. I thought I had done with this eternal “Tompion Clock” in these quotations; but, to my astonishment, I came on it once more in Brayley’s large collection: “The Clock by Tompion, &c.” Neither is it passed over in the more modern guide-books.

The steep and shadowy Gay Street, which leads up to the inviting Crescent and the more sombre Queen Square, affects one curiously. Ascending, we see on the left a modest, compact-looking mansion — the Bath houses are rarely more than two or three stories high — and the only one in the street that displays sculptured decorations. There lived and died Mrs. Piozzi. The Johnsonian must look on it with reverence and even with awe; for a perfect tide of incidents and associations rushes on him at the name, calling up the quick and sparkling vitality of the mercurial lady. Now it seems but her mausoleum ; and lower down at the corner, on the other side, we come upon another brilliant woman's home, with stone bow windows — introduced, I fancy, at a later period. Fanny Burney was a delightful creature, full of the true comedy vein, and many of her scenes are more sparkling than Boswell's. Well, here she lived in her heyday, and before her disastrous "come down " — her marriage, which was foolish as that of her friend. It may be said that all the buildings in Bath are placed most judiciously. We come on them unexpectedly, and find them just where they ought to be. Each has its tone and fitting atmosphere. How delightful to find ourselves stumbling, as it were, on the grand Circus, with its solemn and stately buildings, which contrasts so well with the bright open gaiety of the Crescent! I like this Roman gloom of the Circus, its comparative desolation and solemn old fashion.

The old Assembly Rooms is close to the Circus, between Alfred Street and Bennett Street — a stately, dignified pile, in the best classical style of Bath. One looks on it with a sort of mysterious reverence, and it seems charged with all sorts of memories of old bygone state; for hither all the rank and fashion of Bath used to make its way of Assembly nights. Many years ago there was here given a morning concert to which I found my way, mainly for the purpose of calling up ghostly memories of the Thrales, and Doctor Johnson, and Miss Burney, and, above all, of Mr. Pickwick. Though the music was the immortal "Passion" of Bach, my eyes were travelling all the while from one piece of faded decoration to another. "Boz" never fails to secure the tone of any strange place he is describing. We all, for instance, have that pleased elated feeling on the first morning after our arrival over night at a new place — the general brightness, surprise, and air of novelty. We are willing to be pleased with everything, and pass from object to object with enjoyment. Now, all this is difficult to seize or describe. "Boz" does not do the latter, but he conveys it perfectly. We see the new arrivals seated at breakfast, the entrance of the Dowlers with the M.C., and the party setting off to see the "Lions," the securing tickets for the Assembly, the writing down their names in "the book," Sam sent specially to Queen Square, and so on. All which is very exhilarating, and reveals one's own feeling on such an occasion. The Pumproom books are formally mentioned in the regulations.

We see the Assembly Rooms in Phiz's plate, with its huge and elaborately framed oval mirrors and chandeliers. The dancing-room was set round with raised benches, after the pattern of Ridotto rooms abroad; there were card-rooms and tea-rooms. We note the sort of Adam or Chippendale chair on which the whist dowager is sitting with her back to us.

Considering that the rules of dress were so strict, pumps and silk stockings being of necessity, we may wonder how it was that the President of the Pickwick Club was admitted in his morning dress, his kerseymere tights, white waistcoat, and black gaiters. He never changed his dress for evening parties, save on one occasion. So accurate is the picture that speculation arises whether Phiz went specially to Bath to make his sketches; for the ideas caught in the most perfect way the whole tone of a Bath Assembly, and he could not have obtained this from descriptions by others. So, too, with his picture of the Crescent in Mr. Winkle's escapade. It will be remembered that "Boz" was rather particular about this picture, and suggested some minute alterations. Mr. Pickwick's costume was certainly in defiance of all rules and regulations. It is laid down in the regulations of Mr. Tyson, M.C., that "no gentleman in boots or half-boots be admitted into the rooms on ball nights or card nights." Halfboots would certainly apply to Mr. Pickwick's gaiters. Bantam the M.C., or "the Grand Master" as "Boz" oddly calls him, was drawn from life from an eccentric functionary named Jervois. I have never been quite able to understand his odd hypothesis about Mr. Pickwick being the gentleman who had the waters bottled and sent to Clapham. But how characteristic the dialogue on the occasion! It will be seen that this M.C. cannot credit the notion of anyone of such importance as Mr. Pickwick never having "been in Ba-ath." His ludicrous and absurd, "Not bad — not bad! Good — good. He, he, re-markable! showed how it struck him. A man of such a position too; it was incredible. With a delightful conviction of this theory, he began: "It is long — very long, Mr. Pickwick, since you drank the waters — it appears an age." Mr. Pickwick protested that it was certainly long since he had drunk the waters, and his proof was that he had never been in Bath in his life! After a moment's reflection the M.C. saw the solution. "Oh, I see; yes, yes; good, good; better and better. You are the gentleman residing on Clapham Green who lost the use of your limbs from imprudently taking cold after port wine, who could not be moved in consequence of acute suffering, and who had the water from the King's Bath bottled at 103 degrees and sent by waggon to his bedroom in town, where he bathed, sneezed, and same day recovered." This amusing concatenation is, besides an admirable and very minute stroke of character, and the frivolous M.C. is brought before us perfectly.¹

What a capital touch is that when he saw young Lord Mutanhead approaching. "Hush! draw a little nearer, Mr. Pickwick. You see that splendidly dressed young man coming this way — the richest young man in Bath?"

"You don't say so!" said Mr. Pickwick.

"Yes, you'll hear his voice in a moment, Mr. Pickwick. He'll speak to me." Particular awe and reverence could not be better expressed,

¹ Mr. Bantam could fairly well afford to dress as handsomely as he is described; his fees, collections, &c., came to six or seven hundred a year.

It is curious how accurate the young fellow was in all his details. He describes the ball as beginning at "precisely twenty minutes before eight o'clock"); and according to the old rules it had to begin as soon after seven as was possible. "Stay in the tea-room and take your sixpenn'orth " — Mr. Dowler's advice — was after a regulation "that everyone admitted to the tea-rooms on dress nights shall pay 6d. for tea."

The M.C.'s visit to Mr. Pickwick was a real carrying out the spirit of the regulations, in which it was requested that "all strangers will give the M.C. an opportunity of being introduced to them before they themselves are entitled to that attention and respect."

"The ball nights in Ba-ath," said Mr. Bantam, "are moments snatched from Paradise, rendered bewitching by music, beaut)', elegance, fashion, etiquette, and — and — above all, by the absence of tradespeople, who are quite inconsistent with Paradise, and who have an amalgamation of themselves at the Guildhall every fortnight, which is, to say the least, remarkable. Good-bye, good-bye;" and, protesting all the way downstairs that he was most satisfied and most delighted and most overpowered and most flattered, Angelo Cyrus Bantam, M.C., stepped into a very elegant chariot that waited at the door, and rattled off. A perfect and spirited description of this airy fribble. One little touch alone is de trop and affected — " who are quite inconsistent with Paradise."

We all feel an interest in that capital character, Mr. Dowler, whom I always suspect to have been lightly sketched from "Boz's" then new friend, the late John Forster. Of course, at the time he had not yet thoroughly become acquainted with the critic's rather despotic fashions, and looked on him rather as an influential patron, with whom he would hardly venture to take such a liberty. Still, the likeness is extraordinary. John Forster was a true and fast friend to all who had the happiness of being his friends; but his methods were those of Mr. Dowler, who does everything as John Forster would have done it "Are you going to Bath?" he asked at the coach offices. "I am, sir," said Mr. Pickwick. "And these other gentlemen?" "They are going also," said Mr. Pickwick. "I'll be damned if you're going inside," said the strange man. "Not all of us," said Mr. Pickwick. "No, not all of you. I've taken two places. If they try to squeeze six people into this infernal box that only holds four, I'll take a post chaise and bring an action. I've paid my fare. It won't do, &c." Exactly like him was his warm patronage of Mr. Pickwick at Bath, his at once bringing the M.C. "Bantam," said Mr. Dowler, "Mr. Pickwick and his friends are strangers. They must put their names down. Where's the book?" Here Forster ipse loquitur. The M.C. meekly declared it should be forthcoming; on which Dowler engaged to bring his friends to the Pump-room. "This is a long call. It's time to go. I shall be here in an hour. Come." Like Forster, Dowler had an amiable, gentle wife. At the ball or assembly we hear him: "' Anybody here?" inquired Mr. Dowler suspiciously."

But what most realises the good but impetuous Forster is Bowler's speech at the Assembly Rooms, "Take your sixpenn'orth. They lay on hot water and call it tea. Drink it," said Mr. Dowler in a loud voice, directing Mr. Pickwick." This was exactly the deceased critic — "directing" was his way.

I have often wondered why Phiz and his coadjutor did not choose for a subject the scene of "the swarry." The inimitable figures of Tuckle, Whiffers, and Fred — the affected gentleman in blue — and Mr. Smauker himself would have come out in a racy fashion. But the truth is nothing could have been more judicious and more practical than the selection made, the subjects being confined to the strict business of the story. Other artists have tried their hand on these tempting passages, but somehow always with an indifferent success. They are too episodical.

Nothing is more gratifying to genuine Pickwickians than to find how all these old memories of the book are fondly cherished in the good city. All the Pickwickian localities are identified, and the inhabitants are eager in every way to maintain that Mr. Pickwick belongs to them, and had been with them. We should have had his room in the White Hart pointed out, and it would have been "slept in" by Americans and others, had it still been left to stand. Not long since the writer went to the good old city for the pleasant duty of "preaching Pickwick," as he has done in many places. There is an antique building or temple not far from the Parade, where an old society of the place — the Bath Literary and Scientific Institute — holds its meetings, and here to a crowded gathering, under the presidency of Mr. Austin King, the subject was gone into. It was delightful for the Pickwickian stranger to meet so appreciative a response, and many curious details were mentioned. At the close — such is the force of the delusion — we were all discussing Mr. Pickwick and his movements here and there, with the same conviction as we should have had in the case of Miss Burney, or Mrs. Piozzi, or Dr. Johnson.

The whole atmosphere was congenial, and there was an old world, old-fashioned air over the rooms. It was delightful talking of Mr. Pickwick's Bath adventures in Bath.

Nor is there anything unreasonably fantastical in these speculations. Bantam lived, as we know, in St. James's Square — that very effective enclosure, with its solemn houses and rich deep greenery, that recall our own Fitzroy Square. No. 14 was his house, and this, it was ascertained, was the actual residence of the living M.C. How bold, therefore, of "Boz" to send Sam up to the very square! Every one, too, could point out Mrs. Craddock's house in the Circus — at least, it was one of two. It was No. 15 or 16, because at the time there were only a couple in the middle which were let in lodgings, the rest being private houses. This was fairly reasonable. But how accurate was "Boz"! No doubt he had some friends who were quartered in lodgings here.

I scarcely hoped to find the scene of the footmen's "swarry" tracked out, but so it was. On leaving Queen Square in company with Mr. Smauker to repair to the scene of the festivity, Sam set off walking "towards High Street," then "turned down a bye-street," and would "soon be there." This bye-street was one turning out of Queen Square at the corner next Bantam's house; and a few doors down we come to a rather shabby-looking "public" with a swinging sign, on which is inscribed “The Beaufort Arms “ — a two-storied, three-windowed house. This in the book is called a “greengrocer’s shop,” and is firmly believed to be the scene of “the swarry,” on the substantial ground that the Bath footmen assembled here regularly as at their club. The change from a public to a greengrocer’s scarcely affects the point. The uniforms of these gentlemen’s gentlemen were really splendid, as we learn from the text — rich plushes, velvets, gold lace, canes, &c. There is no exaggeration in this, for natives of Bath have assured me they can recall similar displays at the fashionable church — of Sundays — when these noble creatures, arrayed gorgeously as “generals,” were ranged in lines “waiting their missuses,” or, rather, pace Mr. John Smauker, employers. At this greengrocer’s, where the Bath footmen had their “swarry,” the favourite drink was “cold srub and water,” or “gin and water sweet;” also punch. “Srub,” a West Indian drink, has now altogether disappeared. It sounds strange to learn that a fashionable footman should consult “a copper timepiece which dwelt at the bottom of a deep watch-pocket, and was raised to the surface by means of a black string with a copper key.” A copper watch seems extraordinary, though we have now those of gun metal.

The Crescent, with its fine air and fine view, always strikes one with admiration as a unique and original monument, the size and proportions are so truly grand. The whole scene of Mr. Winkle’s escapade here is extraordinarily vivid, and so protracted, while Mrs. Dowler was waiting in her sedan for the door to be opened, that it has the effect of imprinting the very air, look, and tone of the Royal Crescent on us. We seem to be waiting with her and the chairmen. It seems the most natural thing in the world. The houses correspond almost exactly with Phiz’s drawing.

Pickwick, it has been often pointed out, is full of amusing “oversights,” which are pardonable enough, and almost add to the “fun” of the piece. At the opening Mr. Pickwick is described as carrying his portmanteau — in the picture it is a carpet-bag. The story opens in 1827, but at once Mr. Jingle begins to talk of being present at the late Revolution of 1830. The George and Vulture is placed in two different streets. Old Weller is called Samuel. During the scene at the Royal Crescent we are told that Mrs. Craddock threw up the drawing-room window “just as Mr. Winkle was rushing into the chair.” She ran and called Mr. Dowler, who rushed in just as Mr. Pickwick threw up the other window, “when the first object that met the gaze of both was Mr. Winkle bolting into the sedan chair,” into which he had bolted a minute before.

The late Charles Dickens the younger, in the notes to his father’s writings, affects to have discovered an oversight in the account of the scene in the Circus. It is described how Winkle “took to his heels and tore round the Crescent, hotly pursued by Dowler and the coachman. He kept ahead; the door was open as he came round the second time,” &c. Now, objects the son, the Crescent is only a half circle; there is no going round it, you must turn back when you come to the end. He is supposed to have been thinking of the Circus. Hardly — for he knew both well — and Circus and Crescent are things not to be confused. The phrase was a little loose; but, as the Circus was curved, “round” is not inappropriate, and he meant that Winkle turned when he got to the end, ran round, and ran back.

Then, we are told, if it were theatre night, perhaps the visitors met at the theatre. Now, did Mr. Pickwick ever go? This is an open question. Is the chronicler here a little obscure, as he is speaking of “the gentlemen” en bloc! Perhaps he did, perhaps he didn’t, as “Boz” might say. On his visit to Rochester it does not appear that he went to see his “picked-up” friend Jingle perform.

The Bath Theatre is in the Saw Close, next door to Beau Nash’s picturesque old house. The old grey front, with its blackened mouldings and sunk windows, is still there; but a deep vestibule or entrance, with offices, has been built out in front, which, as it were, thrusts the old wall back — an uncongenial mixture. Within, the house has been reconstructed, as it is called, so that Mr. Palmer, or Dimond, or any of the old Bath lights, to say nothing of Mr. and Mrs. Siddons, would not recognise it. Attending it one night, I could not but recall the old Bath traditions, when this modest little house supplied the London houses regularly with the best talent, and “From the Theatre Royal, Bath,” was a delightful inducement set forth on the bill.

After his brilliant, genial view of the old watering-place it is a surprise to find “Boz” speaking of it with a certain acerbity and even disgust. Over thirty years later, in 1869, he was there, and wrote to Forster: “The place looks to me like a cemetery, which the dead have succeeded in rising and taking. Having built streets of their old gravestones, they wander about scantily, trying to look alive — a dead failure.” And yet, what ghostly recollections must have come back to him as he walked those streets, or as he passed by the Saracen’s Head in Walcot, where he had put up in those old days, full of brightness, ardour, and enthusiasm; but not yet the famous “Boz”! Bath folk set down this jaundiced view of their town to a sort of pique at the comparative failure of the Guild dramatic performance at the Old Assembly Rooms, where, owing to the faulty arrangement of the stage, hardly a word could be heard, to the dissatisfaction of the audience. The stage, it seems, was put too far behind the proscenium, “owing to the headstrong perversity of Dickens, who never forgave the Bath people.” Charles Knight, it was said, remonstrated, but in vain. “Boz,” however, was not a man to indulge in such feelings, and the idea is far fetched.

There had, however, been a previous visit to Bath, in company with Maclise and Forster, to see Landor, who was then living at No. 35 St. James’s Square — a house become memorable because it was there that the image of his “Little Nell” first suggested itself. The enthusiastic Landor used, in his “tumultuous” fashion, to proclaim that he would set fire to the house and burn it to the ground, to prevent its being profaned by less sacred associations! He had done things even more extravagant than this, and would take boisterous roars of laughter as his odd compliment was discussed.

The minuteness of his record of the gaieties shows how amused and interested “Boz” was in all that he saw. Nothing escaped him of the routine, day, hour, and place; all is given, even the different rooms at the Assembly House. “In the ball-room, the long cardroom, the octagon card-room, the staircases, the passages, the hum of many voices and the sound of many feet were perfectly bewildering; dresses rustled, feathers waved, lights shone, and jewels sparkled. There was the music, not of the quadrille band, for it had not yet commenced, &c.” Here Bantam, M.C., arrived at precisely twenty minutes before eight, “to receive the company.” And such company! “Brilliant eyes, lighted up with pleasurable expectation, gleamed from every side, and, look where you will, some exquisite form glided gracefully through the throng, and was no sooner lost than it was replaced by another as dainty and bewitching;” the warmth of the description showing how delighted was the young man with all he saw. But how did he secure admission? — for it was a highly fashionable company; there were vouchers and tickets to be secured. But these were slight difficulties for our brilliant “pushful” young man. He could make his way, and his mission found him interest. He certainly saw as much of Bath as anyone could in the time. Yet» gay and sprightly as his account of Bath, there may have been a reason why “Boz” may not have recalled the place with pleasurable feelings. It will be recollected that after giving a few lines to the account of Mr. Pickwick and friends being set down at the White Hart, he carries them off at once to lodgings in the Crescent. That first-class hotel was, alas! not open to the poor, overworked reporter; and he could tell of nothing that went forward within its portals. Hotel life on a handsome scale was not for him, and he was obliged to put up at far humbler quarters, a sort of common inn.

There is nothing more quaint or interesting than this genuine antique — the Saracen’s Head in Walcot. It may pair off with the old White Horse in the Canongate, where “Great Sam” put up for a night. It is surely the most effective of all the old inns one could see. It has two faces, and looks into two different streets, with its double gables, and date (1713) inscribed on a tablet outside. It is a yellow, well-worn little building. And you enter through darkened tunnels, as it were, cut through the house, coming into a strange yard of evident antiquity, with a steep, ladder-like flight of stone steps that leads up to a window much like the old Canongate houses. Here, then, it was that “Boz” put up, and here are preserved traditions and relics of his stay. One of the tales is that, after some exuberant night during the election he would light his candle, and, having to cross the court, would have it blown out half a dozen times, when he would go back patiently to relight it. They show his chair, and a jug out of which he drank, but one has not much faith in such chairs and jugs; they always seem to be supplied to demand, and must be found to gratify the pilgrims.

One of the examination queries which might have found a place in Mr. Calverley’s paper of questions is this: When did Mr. Pickwick sit down to make entries in his journal, and spend half an hour in so doing ? — At Bath, on the night of Mr. Winkle’s race round the Crescent. What was this journal, or why did he keep it, or why is this the only allusion to it? Mr. Snodgrass was the appointed historiographer of the party, and his “notes” are often spoken of and appealed to as the basis of the chronicle. But half an hour, as I say, was the time the great man seems to have allotted to his posting up the day’s register: “Mr. Pickwick shut up the book, wiped his pen on the bottom of the inside of his coat-tail, and opened the drawer of the inkstand to put it carefully away.” How particular — how real all this is! This it is that gives the living force to the book, and to the persuasion — irresistible almost — that it is all about some living person. I have often wondered how it is that this book of “Boz’s” has such an astounding power of development, such a fertility in engendering other books, and what is the secret of it! Scott’s astonishing Waverley series, Thackeray’s “Vanity Fair,” “Boz’s” own “Nicholas Nickleby,” “Oliver Twist,” in fact, not one of the whole series save “the immortal ‘Pickwick,’” has produced anything in the way of books or commentaries. I believe it is really owing to this. “Boz” was a great admirer of Boswell’s equally immortal book. I have heard him speak of it. He attempted parodies of it even. He knew all the turns, the Johnsonian twists, “Why, sirs, &c,” and used them in his letters. He was permeated with the Johnsonian ether; that detail, that description of trifling things that was in Boswell attracted him, and he felt it; and the fact remains that Pickwick is written on the principles — no copy — of the great biography, and that “Boz applied to a mere fictional story what was related in the account of a living man. Bozzy’s very natural and unaffected narrative of details suggested all this to “Boz” I firmly believe that this is the true solution. And it is really curious that Boswell’s “Life of Johnson” should be the only other book that tempts people to the same rage for commentary, illustrations, and speculations. These are of exactly the same character in both books. But to return.

The MS. that Mr. Pickwick so oddly found in the drawer of his inkstand at Mrs. Craddock’s, Royal Crescent, Bath, offered another instance of “Boz’s” ingenious methods of introducing episodic tales into his narrative. He was often hard put to it to find an occasion: they were highly useful to fill a space when he was pressed for matter. He had the strongest penchant for this sort of thing, and it clung to him through life. Those in “Pickwick” are exceedingly good, full of spirit and “go,” save one, the “Martha Lobbs” story, which is a poorish thing. So good are the others that they have been taken out and published separately. They were no doubt written for magazines, and were lying by him, but his Bath story — “The True Legend of Prince Bladud” — was written specially. It is quite in the vein of Elia’s Roast Pig story, and very gaily told. He had probably been reading some local guide-book, with the mythical account of Prince Bladud, and this suggested to him his own humorous version. At the close he sets Mr. Pickwick a-yawning several times, who, when he had arrived at the end of this little manuscript, which certainly could not have been compressed into “a couple of sheets of writing-paper,” but would have covered at least ten pages, replaced it in the drawer, and “then, with a countenance of the utmost weariness, lighted his chamber candle and went upstairs to bed.” And here, by the way, is one of the amusing oversights which give such a piquancy to Pickwick. Before he began to read his paper we are carefully told that Mr. Pickwick “unfolded it, lighted his bedroom candle that it might burn up by the time he had finished.” It was Mr. C. Kent who pointed this out to him, when “Boz” seized the volume and humorously made as though he would hurl it at his friend.

Anyone interested in Bath must of necessity be interested in Bristol, to which, as all know, Mr. Winkle fled after the unhappy business in the Circus. He found a coach at the Royal Hotel — which no longer exists — a vehicle which, we are told, went the whole distance “twice a day and more “ with a single pair of horses. There he put up at the Bush, where Mr. Pickwick was to follow him presently. The Bush — a genuine Pickwick inn, where Mr. Pickwick first heard the news of the action that was to be brought against him — stood in Corn Street, near to the Guildhall, the most busy street in Bristol; but it was taken down in 1864, and the present Wiltshire Bank erected on the site.

It must have been awkward for Winkle to present himself once more at Mrs. Craddock’s in the Crescent. How was the incident to be explained save either at his own expense or at that of Mr. Dowler? If Dowler were supposed to have gone in pursuit of him, then Mr. Winkle must have fled; and if he were supposed to have gone to seek a friend, then Dowler was rather compromised. No doubt both gentlemen agreed to support the one story that they had gone away for mutual satisfaction, and had made it up.

Nothing is more wonderful than “Boz’s” propriety in dealing with his incidents, a propriety that is really instinctive. Everything falls out in the correct, natural way. For instance, Mr. Pickwick having received such a shock at the Bush — the announcement of the Bardell action — was scarcely in heart to resume his jollity and gaieties at Bath. We might naturally expect a resumption of the frolics there. He accordingly returned there; but we are told curtly, “The remainder of the period which Mr. Pickwick had assigned as the duration of his stay at Bath passed over without the occurrence of anything material. Trinity term commenced on the expiration of its first week. Mr. Pickwick and his friends returned to London; and the former gentleman, attended of course by Sam, straightway repaired to his old quarters at the George and Vulture.”

And now in these simple sentences have we not the secret of the great attraction of the book? Who would not suppose that this was a passage from a biography of some one that had lived? How carefully minute! and yet how naturally the time is accounted for — “passed over without the occurrence of anything material.” It is impossible to resist this air of vraisemblance.

NICHOLAS NICKLEBY AT HIND HEAD

By Thomas Wright

From: Hind Head, or the English Switzerland and its Literary and Historical Associations, Thomas Wright, Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co., Ltd., 1898, p.41-46

A Roistering Humorist.

In the preceding chapter we spoke of Mr. Baring-Gould's story of the Punch Bowl. Another well-known novel that has reference to the locality is Charles Dickens's Nicholas Nickleby, where may be read the experiences on Hind Head of Nicholas and poor Smike.

Charles Dickens, it is interesting to recollect, was born at Landport, near Portsmouth, the town to which Nicholas and Smike were journeying. His early days were spent at Chatham, but in 1823 the family removed to London, where they fell into poverty, and Charles was at last obliged to work in a blacking factory. Rosier days arriving, he was sent to school, Wellington House Academy, the original of Salem House in the quasi-autobiographical David Copperfield. Subsequently he was placed with an attorney of Gray's Inn. His Pickwick, which appeared in 1837, was followed by Oliver Twist. Then came Nicholas Nickleby, the most hilarious, and on the whole the most pleasing of all his novels. Mr. Andrew Lang, however, in his delightful "Essays in Little," awards the palm to Pickwick. But Nicholas Nickleby has all the vivacity, piquancy, and humour of Pickwick with less vulgarity, and with fewer drunkards. On the other hand it has more buoyancy than the serious Copperfield, for Copperfield is serious, despite the joviality of the inimitable Micawber. The reason of the excellency of Nickleby is obvious. Dickens was at the summit of his fame, trouble had not yet left its print upon him, and he was in roistering spirits. Miss Squeers, Mr. Mantalini, Mr. Crummles, John Browdie, the Kenwigses, what entertaining company they are! After saying this, it may seem ungracious to complain of the two stupid tales, The Five Sisters of York, and The Baron of Grogzwig, inserted in the text, after the mischievous example of Fielding. However the reader can easily skip them.

Dickens and the Punch Bowl.

Nicholas Nickleby, it will be remembered, proceeds to Yorkshire, and becomes assistant to Mr. Squeers of odious memory. Stung to madness by Squeers's brutality, Nicholas gives that gentleman a thrashing, and then trudges southward, in company with a poor half-witted youth named Smike. After various adventures in London they set out for Portsmouth, where Nicholas hoped to obtain employment, perhaps on board a ship. Their route lay through Kingston and Godalming, where they passed a night. The next day brought them to the foot of Hind Head; and no doubt Dickens is really describing a tramp of his own, for, at the time, he was very fond of making long excursions on foot out of London. Here is Hind Head as seen through Dickens's eyes:

It was a harder day's journey than that they had already performed, for there were long and weary hills to climb; and in journeys, as in life, it is a great deal easier to go down hill than up. However, they kept on with unabated perseverance, and the hill has not yet lifted its face to heaven that perseverance will not gain the summit of at last.

They walked upon the rim of the Devil's Punch Bowl, and Smike listened with greedy interest as Nicholas read the inscription upon the stone which, reared upon that wild spot, tells of a foul and treacherous murder committed there by night. The grass on which they stood had once been dyed with gore, and the blood of the murdered man had run down, drop by drop, into the hollow which gives the place its name. "The Devil's Bowl," thought Nicholas, as he looked into the void, "never held fitter liquor than that."

At first I decided to omit the last sentence, but probably it is better, not to eliminate, but to gibbet it. Surely a more inane utterance was never made. A foul tenement in a London slum might be a fit place for a murder, but not a wild and lovely declivity carpeted with ferns and heather. And, yet after all, it was a suitable remark from so colourless and limp a creature as Nicholas

Nickleby. Curiously enough, nearly all Dickens's heroes are uninteresting persons of small mental calibre. None could excel him in depicting:

Thieves, paupers, women of the town,
And the black Thames in which they drown.

He made inimitable wags, disreputables, and devils, but insupportable saints. However, no tint of words, by what artist soever applied, can sully the beauty of the Punch Bowl.

A Golden Saying.

But if the reference to the Punch Bowl is detestable, the reference to the summit of Hind Head is just as felicitous. The inhabitants of the English Switzerland should take it as a compliment that it was their hill that suggested the golden remark: "The hill has not yet lifted its face to heaven that perseverance will not gain the summit of at last." For this, we can forgive Dickens even for the paragraph that succeeded it. Periander of Corinth, hundreds of years before, had said "Nothing is impossible to industry," men of grit in all ages have used similar expressions, but Dickens's variation is none the less welcome. It is a truth that cannot be hammered in too often or too vigorously.

On the Portsmouth Road. But to continue; —

Onward they kept with steady purpose, and entered at length upon a wide and spacious tract of downs, with every variety of little hill and plain to change their verdant surface. Here, there shot up almost perpendicularly into the sky a height so steep, as to be hardly accessible to any but the sheep and goats that fed upon its sides, and there stood a huge mound of green, sloping and tapering off so delicately, and merging so gently into the level ground, that you could scarce define its limits. Hills swelling above each other, and undulations shapely and uncouth, smooth and rugged, graceful and grotesque, thrown negligently side by side, bounded the view in each direction; while frequently, with unexpected noise, there uprose from the ground a flight of crows, who, cawing and wheeling round the nearest hills, as if uncertain of their course, suddenly poised themselves upon the wing and skimmed down the long vista of some opening valley with the speed of very light itself.

By degrees the prospect receded more and more on either hand, and as they had been shut out from rich and extensive scenery, so they emerged once again upon the open country. The knowledge that they were drawing near their place of destination, gave them fresh courage to proceed; but the way had been difficult, and they had loitered on the road, and Smike was tired. Thus twilight had already closed in, when they turned off the path to the door of a road-side inn, yet twelve miles short of Portsmouth.

At the inn Nicholas fell in with Crummles the actor. They journey to Portsmouth together, and he and Smike join the company. How Nicholas and Smike subsequently returned to London, how Nicholas chastised Sir Mulberry Hawk, who had insulted his sister, how he met the Cheerybles, and entered their office, how Smike turned out to be the son of Nicholas's wicked uncle, how both Nicholas and his sister married happily, and the end of poor Smike — all this is as much history as the death of Rufus or the Wars of the Roses.

Nickleby's Successors.

At the time Dickens wrote Nickleby he was a dapper little man of twenty four, delighting in crimson velvet waistcoats, multi-coloured neckties with two breast pins joined by a little gold chain, and yellow kid gloves. He was a perfect toucan for colour; and even later in life he often wore as much jewellery as the proprietor of a travelling menagerie.

His next novel was The Old Curiosity Shop, 1840-41; Martin Chuzzlewit appeared in 1843, Dombey, 1846-8 ; David Copperfield, written partly at Broadstairs, and partly at Bonchurch, 1849-50; Little Dorrit, 1855-57; Our Mutual Friend, 1864-65; and the unfinished Edwin Drood in 1870.

For beauty Dickens had no eye. He was born in a commonplace house (though he couldn't help that), he lived at different times in some dozen of the very ugliest houses in London, and finally, in 1856, he bought, and settled in, the out-of-the-way, unlovely Gad's Hill Place (near Rochester), which he had yearned for from his boyhood. Domestic troubles darkened the second half of his life: and though his later works have scintillations of humour, he who is in search of tumultuous hilarity must turn to his masterpieces.

When Prometheus, with the vulture tearing at his vitals, makes an attempt to be funny, his laughter is apt to sound hollow.

The Literary Crassus.

A great part of his life he wasted in reading, in public, selections from his works; and the consequent strain told upon his health. But his love of excitement, his desire to drown the recollection of his troubles, his intense vanity, and above all his eagerness for wealth — for he was the literary Crassus — forbade him to stop.

Late in 1869 he lunched with George Eliot, and at table told the story of the dream of President Lincoln the last night of his life. The President thought he was alone in a boat on a great river, and the dream ended by his exclaiming: “I drift — I drift — I drift.” “Dickens,” adds George Eliot, “told this very finely. I thought him looking dreadfully shattered.”

He died at Gad’s Hill on 9th of June 1870, at the comparatively early age of 58.

CHARLES DICKENS.

Beyond question, Dickens is the greatest humorist the world has seen. His historical story, "The Tale of Two Cities," a mere secondary reflection of Carlyle's "French Revolution," is a hopeless failure. Even Sidney Carton does not save it. Dickens exhibits no pathos, except in a few unpremeditated passages. The last man who wept, or thought he wept, over Little Nell has long "to the dust gone down."

I, for one, am sealed of the tribe of Charles, but I am not blind to his failings. As a man he could not bear fame. It spoilt him and rendered him foolish. In his younger days his bonhomie, his brightness, his good humour, were the light of any society; as he advanced in years he appeared to all, except a small band of bosom friends, in a very unpleasing light. His insolence and arrogance, on occasion, caused as much pain and indignation as surprise. He was one of the few really great men whom it is little loss not to have met. But what a debt of gratitude we owe him!" No other man," as Mr. Lang truly remarks," has caused so many sad hearts to be lifted up in laughter; no other has added so much mirth to the toilsome and perplexed life of men, of rich and poor, of learned and unlearned."

At Dorking in this county may be seen "The Marquis of Granby" (The King's Head) made famous by Pickwick. It is now the Post Office, and the horse-trough in which the Rev. Mr. Stiggins was dipped has disappeared.

The life of Dickens has been written by his friend Forster. As I am myself engaged upon an exhaustive biography of Dickens, I scarcely like to describe my predecessor's as the most slovenly written and incomplete biography on the great scale ever produced by a man of ability. And yet it is the truth. Now Dickens, whatever his faults, took immense pains with everything he put his hand to, so if Forster's ghost meets Dickens's ghost in that "country from whose bourn no traveller returns," there will be fierce looks and high words. Forster will then be able to point down to my biography (which, whatever its shortcomings, will be the result of great labour and careful investigation), with the observation that but for his, it would never have been written. Dickens will immediately be appeased, his features will relax, as they were wont to do at Gad's when his admirers piled the flattery higher than usual, the ghosts will embrace, and I shall be the happy medium of reconciling two irate but not unworthy shades, who but for me might have imbued their hands with each other's — ether.

LITERARY GEOGRAPHY: THE COUNTRY OF DICKENS

By William Sharp

Don't you know?

LITERARY GEOGRAPHY.

THE COUNTRY OF DICKENS.

BY WILLIAM SHARP.

From: The Pall Mall Magazine, February 1903, p.237-247

WE have each our pet superstition. Some of a morning look for a text of augury, and go about the day's business in comfort, or it may be in tribulation. Others are affected by the apparition of a black cat. There are persons who jealously count the teastrays in the breakfast-cup; others as sane who rejoice or lament accordingly as the first individual they see is hale, a hunchback, or red-haired. A lady whom I know cannot abide three sparrows at once on the window-sill. With her, I believe, four would not constitute a menace; two would be unworthy of notice; possibly two and a robin might be considered verging on the perilous. The fad of the present confessor is to glance casually into a volume that must be taken up at random before he begins to commit his accumulated wisdom to paper. I believe (for the creatures of whim have vagaries, of course) that the proper thing to do is to glance thus at random into one or other book (blindly selected) by the author to be written of. But this is not always feasible. As a rule, Pythagoras or Confucius does not lie handy by one's pipe; "Lear" (Edwin) and the "Bab Ballads" may have been appropriated by the "buttons"; and one does not habitually carry the Encyclopaedia Britannica and the Library of the World's Best Literature along with one's bag and tackle to an anglers' inn in Wales or to a Highland hostelry by hill or loch. Besides, the theme may not be an author awaiting the decorator or slater. It may be a subject "walking its wild lone" (to quote from Mr. Kipling's latest) — such as "logarithms," or "gnosticism," or the "binomial theorem." In such desperate straits the only hope is to seize the right alphabetical volume of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, and then follow the example of Mr. Pott, the editor of the Eatanswill Gazette, or rather of Mr. Pott's critic, who, that great editor told Mr. Pickwick, compiled his erudite and amazing article on Chinese metaphysics by taking Vol. M of the Encyclopaedia and reading it through for "Metaphysics," and Vol. C and reading it through for "China" — "and then combined his information, sir."

So, when I began to write this article for Mr. Pott — I mean for the Editor of the Pall Mall Magazine — I carefully became casual as I approached the Dickens row on my bookshelves. The result was not what I hoped. I had trusted to David Copperfield or Great Expectations; it was Bleak House. I sighed, and opened at the first page which my forefinger thrust out "from the dim destiny of things." And here is what I read (the seeker will find it in the twenty-sixth chapter, in the dialogue between Phil Squod and Trooper George): —

"And so, Phil," says George of the shooting-gallery, after several turns in silence, 'you were dreaming of the country last night?'

"'Yes, guv'ner.'

"'What was it like?'

"'I hardly know what it was like, guv'ner,' said Phil, considering.

"'How did you know it was the country?'

"'On account of the grass, I think. And the swans upon it,' says Phil, after further consideration.

"'What were the swans doing on the grass?'

Dickens alludes through the mouth of Phil Squad (as earlier in Bleak House in the chapter headed "Fog on the Essex Marshes, Fog on the Kentish Heights") —the scenery, too, of some of Dickens' finest backgrounds, as in Great Expectations —are the Cooling Flats beyond Higham and Cliffe, along the reach of Thames some seven miles from Gad's Hill. But, at the moment, I am not thinking of that desolate region; nor of its heart, Cooling Castle ruins and lonely Cooling churchyard, where poor silence, 'you were dreaming of the country last night?'

"'Yes, Guv'ner'

"'What was it like?'

"'I hardly know what it was like, guv'ner,' said Phil, considering.

"'How did you know it was the country?'

"'On account of the grass, I think. And the swans upon it,' says Phil, after further consideration.

"'What were the swans doing on the grass?'

"'They was a-eating of it, I expect, says Phil. . . .

"'The country,' says Mr. George, applying his knife and fork: '...why, I suppose you never clapped your eyes on the country, Phil?'

"'I see the marshes once,' says Phil, contentedly eating his breakfast.

"'What marshes?'

"'The marshes, commander,' returns Phil.

"'Where are they?'

"'I don't know where they are,' says Phil, 'but I see 'em, guv'ner. They was flat. And misty.'"

The marshes and the country to which little Pip was compelled by the villainous Magwitch to promise his return on the morrow with "a file and wittles,” on the penalty of having his quaking little heart and small liver summarily removed from his trembling little body.

For I am thinking, instead, of the aptness of this page selected at random. It might be paraphrased (and augmented) thus:

Reader: “And so you were dreaming of the country of Dickens last night?”

Writer: “Yes, guv’ner.”

Reader: “What was it like?”

Writer: “I hardly know what it was like, guv’ner.”

Cooling Castle. (“Great Expectations.”)

Reader: “How did you know it was the country?”

Writer: “On account of the explicit directions. An’ the bits of colour, an’ the purple patches on it.”

Reader: “What were the purple patches doing there?”

Writer: “They were just a-enjoying o’ themselves, I think.”

Reader: “The country” [here the Reader waves his paper-knife admonishingly] ...” why, I suppose you never clapped your eyes on the country of Dickens!”

Writer: “I see the ‘This - Way Private ‘-way into the heart of it once, guv’ner” [this with a conscious sniff of superiority].

Reader: “What do you mean, man?”

Writer: “The country . . . an’ the purple patches, an’ the Thames grey, an’ the Thames mud, an’ — an’ — an’ the whole o’ London, from Wapping Stairs to Wormwood Scrubbs.”

Reader: “Why, you’re mixing up town and country! I expect you see hits of country a-straddle on London streets!”

Writer: “No; I think I see all London, flying country-kites on each of the four winds.”

Reader: “You mean that in Dickens’ country it’s mostly London?”

Writer: “Pretty much so, commander.”

Reader: “And what about that Private Way you spoke of?”

Writer: “That lies through Dickens’ heart and mind, guv’ner. If you’ll go through the one and round the other, you’ll soon find your way to Dickens’ country. And a beautiful country it is. But it isn’t London.”

The Fulstaff Inn, Gad’s Hill

Reader: “And what do you mean by that?”

Writer: “I mean what I say, commander. For it’s a painted country, the picture of a country or sketches of bits of a country we see in Dickens-land; but London’s never far off, and Dickens just steps down from it as from a coach, and notes down and sketches free just what he sees. Then he — and we — feel the pull o’ London again, an’ it’s off for Fogtown we are and the Thames shores. He writes like a man who lives in a big town, and enjoys getting out of it for a bit: and he writes like a clever journalist often, with his eye on all the salient features: and he writes sometimes like a fine artist, selecting and ignoring and heightening, and giving the whole (and a lot more) in the fewest lines, and with every word alive and every sentence as well groomed as (let us say) your irreproachable self.”

Reader: “But there’s any amount of fine stuff in Dickens about the country.”

Writer: “Right you are, guv’ner. And especially about the sea and the sea-coast, which isn’t exactly country, but still isn’t town, any more than a gull on the Serpentine is a land-mew. But you see, commander, if you was to take all the country out o’ Dickens, why, Dickens would still remain, though we’d miss a lot.

The “old curiosty shop,” Lincoln’s Inn.

It's what's in the country he cared about. 'Give me London and let the rest go,' he would have said, if he'd had to make the choice."

Reader: "But you might say the same

The part marked 1 is pre-eminently the Dickens country, from Yarmouth on the north to Dover on the south. Apart from David Copperfield, Pickwick, Great Expectations, etc., it comprises Gad's Hill and Broadstairs, for long the novelist's two favourite places of residence. Rochester (the Cloisterham, Dullborough, Mudfog, etc., of the novels) may be called its literary capital. (Several of the novels, mostly cast in London or other towns, run into No. 1, as, beside those named, A Tale of Two Cities, Bleak House, etc.)

No. 2. For parts of Oliver Twist, Old Curiosity Shop, Barnaby Rudge, etc.

No. 3. Mainly for Nicholas Nickleby in its two sections, and also in its upper part for Master Humphrey's Clock.

No. 4. The country of Martin Chuzzlewit away from London.

No. 5. The country of Dombey and Son.

thing of Scott, or Thackeray, or Thomas Hardy!"

Writer: "Not a bit of it, commander. Scott and Thackeray always had 'nature' (the country, you know) in one hand and 'human nature' in the other; and wherever they dabbed the one they leavened it with the other, or whenever they worked a bit at the clay they always struck it up agin the other so that we might see it better and in better proportions. And what Scott did more than Thackeray, Thomas Hardy does more than Scott. Why, there's more 'country' in almost any chapter of The Return of the Native or

Far from the Madding Crowd, in The Woodlanders or Under the Greenwood Tree, than in the whole of Dickens.”

Reader: “Well, I’m tired of this discussion, anyhow.”

Writer: “So am I, guv’ner.”

But that, though crudely put, and with striking exceptions ready for arraignment against one, is pretty well “the way of it.” To map out Dickens’ country would be inordinately to map out London; and for that literary-geographical task a directory and not a magazine article would be requisite. If one could depict the London scenes associated with Dickens’ offspring, one would have a Topographical Survey that would vie with the masterpieces of the Ordnance Department. One might start with Captain Sim Tappertit, from Paper Buildings, and go north, west, south and east, finding hardly a street or square or court untrodden once of the clan of Dickens. One may hear much good and ill of Furnival’s Inn; but has it any chronicle better than that here (in the first months of his married life) Dickens wrote most of Pickwick? Hungerford Stairs may now be forgotten in Charing Cross station, but the name is in the sure keeping of David Copperfield. Rumour has it that Lincoln’s Inn Fields is no longer what it was; but the pilgrim will not forget No. 58, where Forster lived, and where Dickens read the MS. of The Chimes to Carlyle, Maclise and others, and where, too, Mr. Tulkinghorn, of Bleak House, had his abode. Much minor poetry has been written at or near Fountain Court, but none so enduring as the unversified episode of Tom Pinch and Ruth. “The Wooden Midshipman” may be hard to find, but the thirsty explorer in the City may mention Captain Cuttle and perchance be guided to the Minorities. In fact, anywhere, from Clerkenwell Green, where the Artful Dodger educated Oliver Twist in the way his right hand should go, to the “Spaniards’ Inn” at Hampstead, where Mr. Pickwick and Mrs. Bardell enjoyed tea; from Bow Bells, where to-day another Dombey & Son succeed without a Mr. Carker as manager, to that far suburban west that may almost be said to reach to Stoke Pogis, where not alone lies Gray, but also (in the pious wish of many) Wilkins Micawber, who sighed, on one occasion, to be laid with the rude forefathers of that particular hamlet — anywhere, I repeat, one might wander, with surety of being in Dickens-land, of coming upon some house, court, street, square, or locality associated with the personages of that marvellous tragicomedy, the “world” of Charles Dickens.

But in this article, which is one of a series to deal with the geography of the imagination, we are to follow “Boz,” if not into “the real country,” at least into the perhaps more seductive country of Dickens-land, or to those provincial towns and localities which he commandeered with his pen. I doubt if mention of Warwick Castle and Kenilworth and Leamington Priors, with all their associations with Mr. Dombey and the Hon. Mrs. Skewton, and Withers, the wan page, and Major Bagstock, with his “Where’s my scoundrel ?” — or of the far north “King’s Head,” at Barnard Castletown, to which Newman Noggs (when he mysteriously pulled Nicholas Nickleby’s leg as that youth left in the North coach) specially recommended the forlorn traveller on his way to Dotheboys Hall, for its ale and other advantages — or even of Portsmouth, with its memories of the talented Crummles family, Miss Snevellicci, Mr. and Mrs. Lillyvick, and Nicholas Nickleby’s brief theatrical career as Mr. Johnson — or even of Ipswich and the “Great White Horse Hotel,” where Mr. Pickwick had his “romantic” and embarrassing adventure with a middle-aged lady in yellow curl-papers — or even of that inn of inns, the “Maypole,” at Chigwell, that every Barnaby-Rudgian loves with an ideal passion, as the Moslem ecstatic dreams of the “replete with every comfort” oases of Paradise — or even . . . But no, there is one locality that gives (as surely as the others mentioned do not give) a quicker thrill to the Dickens enthusiast than mention of Shadwell and Wapping and Rotherhithe, of Limehouse Reach and Ratcliffe Highway, of all the gloom-and-comedy dock-land from Southwark Bridge to Mill wall: and that, of course, is Yarmouth — Yarmouth and its neighbourhood. . . . Blunderstone, where the Copperfields lived; Hopton, through which Barkis was wont to drowse behind the laziest horse in literature; and Gorleston, or Fritton Decoy, whence (in Barkis’ van) David Copperfield and Danl Peggotty and the stout lady who said she was proud to call herself a “Yarmouth Bloater” “viewed the prospect” seaward, and the whole inland circuit from Nelson’s Point, the tongue of land where Peggotty and Little Em’ly had their house. Is not the land sacred to the loves of Joram and Miss Omer, the Aucassin and Nicolette of the undertaking business ... as well as to Little Em’ly and Peggotty and ‘Am the good and brave, to say nothing of that gastronomic juggler of a waiter at the “Angel Inn,” who “assisted” little Copperfield to “finish” his dinner.

Yes, in Dickensland, London has only one possible rival in the imagination. The rest is episodic. Here is “the other ode” of life.

And as we have nothing to do here with such minor places as America — despite Martin Chuzzlewit's voyage to that country — nor with such out-of-the-way little places as Geneva, though it was here that so much of Dombey and Son was written, and here that, with a longing which was an ache of pain, Dickens so yearned for the London he loved, and wearied for the streets and street-life which, he said himself, were his best inspiration, — as, I say, we have nothing to do with chance visitations of any members of the Dickens world in Paris or elsewhere beyond English shores, let us begin at Yarmouth. This is a much simpler plan than to attempt the hundred gates of London, in an effort to travel with Mr. Pickwick, with Nicholas Nickleby, with David Copperfield, with Martin Chuzzlewit, and the many lesser Dickensian wayfarers from the metropolis: a plan suitable for the leisurely procedure of a book, not for the summary disposal of a magazine article. I have heard of an enthusiast who yearly repeats the Pickwickian pilgrimage. He drives in a fourwheeler (as did Mr. Pickwick) from Goswell Street; he has, with the cabby, a Pickwickian argument, on arrival at the 'Golden Cross' Hotel; and though, as Mr. Pickwick did, he cannot now travel by coach from that hostelry, he starts almost as expeditiously from Charing Cross, whence (very often) local trains emulate the fastest coach. It is his lasting regret that no Mr. Alfred Jingle has as yet rescued him from irate cabby or other perils of street or station. He would give much to hear that rapid interjectionalist warn him to beware of some arch or buttress, at least of uncertain ladder or shaky plank:

Dickens-land: old inn. Thames side.

“Terrible place — dangerous work — other day — five children — mother — tall lady, eating sandwiches — forgot the arch — crash — knock — children look round — m other’s head off — sandwich in her hand — no mouth to put it in — head of a family o(f — shocking — shocking.”

Now, that enthusiast makes an obvious mistake. It is like that of the gentleman who took his second wife along the route of his first honeymoon. Dame Chance abhors the fatuous. Of course, this Pickwickian of to-day never encountered an Alfred Jingle. Perhaps, if he had gone in the opposite direction, and talked politics, or chess, or the Siamese succession, something might have happened. But never along the line of another’s merry or romantic fortune!

It is a much better plan to follow the example of Mr. Micawber when he made up his mind to visit Canterbury. What close reader of David Copperfield can have forgotten Mrs. Micawber’s explanation to David, of how Mr. Micawber had been induced to think that there might be an opening for a man of his talent, in the Medway coal trade – and how he had decided that, clearly, the first step to be taken was to come and see the Medway. And the inn at Canterbury, where Mrs. Micawber reposed in the odoriferous parlour, under the print of a race horse, and Mr. Micawber lived with epicurean abandonment when he was not on the look-out for something to turn up (and he expressly spoke, it will be remembered, of “the great probability of something turning up in a Cathedral town”), had seemed to the Medwayan pilgrims a proper starting-point whence to explore the region of coal trade opportunities.

So we may follow Mr. Micawber’s example, and say that as there’s an opening for our talent as cicerone to Dickens’ country, we may as well go and look at the country first; and that something may turn up, in the way of an inspiration of something to say, at Yarmouth, though that isn’t in the country, but on the sea-shore.

But, after all, when one has reached Bloaterville (as it has wickedly been suggested to call the ancient burgh), what is there to see...what, that is, of the Dickensian or Copperfeldian Yarmouth? A great town lives on the Yare, with a proud suburban villadom on the sea-front; big hotels stare the little old inns out of countenance. True, on that sea front, about a mile and a half away, near Gorleston Pier, there is a wooden “shanty” called Peggotty’s Hut. Unfortunately, the truth ends there.

else reader of Daniel Copperfield can have forgotten Mrs Micawber's explanation is David, of how Mr. Micawber had been induced to think that there might be an opening, for a man of his talent, in the Medway coal trade—and how he had decided that, clearly, the first step to be taken was to come and see the Medway.

to explore the regions of coal-trade opportunities.

So we may follow Mr. Micawber's example, and say that, as there's an opening for our talent as coroner to Dickens' country, we may as well go and look at the country first; and that something may turn up, in the way of an

But, after all, when one has reached Blouetville (as it has wickedly been suggested to call the ancient borough, what is there to say... what, that is, of the Dickensian or Copperfeldian Yarmouth? A great town lies on the Yare, with a proud suburban villadom on the sea-front; big hotels stare the little old inns out of

No, there is not much to be seen of the Yarmouth of Dan'l and Little Em'ly, of 'Am and David and the seductive Steerforth. Perhaps at dusk one can imagine, at the south end of the Marine Parade, a black upturned barge or smack, with little windows and a slim iron funnel doing duty as a chimney. If so, the gifted visionary may also hear the deep tumultuous roar of Dan'l Peggotty singing “When the stormy winds do blow, do blow, do blow,” or Little Em'ly's sweet laughter, or Steerforth warbling tears into the eyes of his companions. But the pilgrim to that spot — then solitary at the upper reach of a tract of sand and grass, and between the Wellington Pier and the South Battery — may much more likely see clusters of exuberant trippers, or hear the strains of the Jewish harp or the fell dissonance of the inflated Teuton. There are many of the kindred of Miss Mowcher, but that gay and discursive immortal never visited any inn in Yarmouth save that in the Yarmouth of Dickens' imagination.

Many Barkises may be willing: the breed, to meet of a ramble, is extinct. Yet, behind the town, away by the Lowestoft road, or by Somerleyton Park to Blundeston (it was at Blunderstone Rookery Vicarage, it will be remembered, that Mrs. Copperfield bore her son David) there are still bits of East Anglian country unchanged since the days Barkis guided his carrier's cart (with the horse that could not be driven, but only gradually induced) through green lanes and pastoral byways. And the visitor who has reserved David Copperfield to read or re-read at Yarmouth will find certain pleasure in many passages in that enduringly fascinating romance, remarkable alike for their truth in local colour and for their charm in swift and deft impression. And here, too, Dickens showed what he could do as "a marine artist." The description of the great storm on the German Ocean that brought back the drowned seducer to the home he had ruined, and, with him, his would-be generous and unknowing saviour Ham, is one of the finest things of its kind in literature.

It would be natural to visit the Barnaby Rudge country, on the return towards London. The visitor should, for that, go to Buckhurst Hill, on the Ongar branch railway, for Chigwell and the famous "Maypole" inn.

On a fine May or June evening — early in the week — one may still have a possible quiet half-hour at the pleasant "King's Head" of fact, and imagine Mrs. Varden gloating to bewilderment over the superlativeness of that inn of inns, or John Willet ordering that lordly and copious "something of that sort," that might have been a roast peacock as well as not, or see for a moment, in the doorway, like a wild flower strayed from the neighbouring forest, pretty Dolly Varden, in her pretty cherry-coloured mantle and little tilted straw hat trimmed with cherry-coloured ribbons ("the wickedest and most provoking headdress ever devised"), or even see, in fancy, Chigwell churchyard, where Barnaby Rudge and his mother rested and ate their poor meal after their visit to The Warren, while Grip, the raven, having finished his dinner, stalked up and down with an appearance of having his hands under his coat-tails and of critically reading the tombstone inscriptions.

After that . . . well, one may go south with Great Expectations, and down the Thames reaches, past Cooling Marshes; or through Gravesend, and by Cobham Hall (where the great novelist's writing chalet, from Gad's Hill, now stands in a pleasant sequestered grove behind the beautiful old home of the Earl of Darnley), to Rochester and the Pickwickian track; or, thence, to the Great South Road, going past the Devil's Punch Bowl on Hind head Heights, and so to Portsmouth by the long undulations of the Downs — the road traversed by Nicholas Nickleby and Smike on their eventful journey from London to where fate and the Crummles family awaited them.

This last is a country Dickens knew and loved, though it had not the fascination for him of the dreary Thames marshlands.

It was a harder day's journey than they had already performed, for there were long and weary hills to climb, and in journeys, as in life, it is a great deal easier to go down hill than up. Onward they kept with steady purpose, and entered at length upon a wide and spacious tract of downs with every variety of little hill and plain to change their verdant surface. Here there shot up almost perpendicularly into the sky a height so steep as to be hardly accessible to any but the sheep and goats that fed upon its sides, and there stood a huge mound of green, sloping and tapering off so delicately, and merging so gently into the level ground, that you could scarce define its limits. Hills swelling above each other, and undulations, shapely, uncouth, smooth, and rugged, graceful and grotesque, thrown negligently side by side, bounded the views in each direction, while frequently, with unexpected noise, there uprose from the ground a flight of crows, who, cawing and wheeling around the nearer hills, as if uncertain of their course, suddenly poised themselves upon the wing, and skimmed down the long vista of some opening valley with the speed of very light itself. . . .

Or, from London, one may start again at once for the Martin Chuzzlewit country, with Salisbury as the town to reach; or for Leamington and Warwick and Kenilworth, with solemn Mr. Dombey as companion; or north to the frontiers of York and Durham counties, where to-day no Squeers will ask you to spell “winder,” and rudely add, on your compliance, “then go and clean it”

But to get “right away into the real country” (as Richard Jefferies, for example, would take us) . . . h'm . . . that, indeed, is difficult. With the ancient dowager, the Hon. Mrs. Skewton, I may say, “seclusion and contemplation are my what's-his-name.” It may be remembered that, to this, her eldest daughter snapped that if she meant Paradise she had better say so. Well, by “the real country” I mean Paradise. . . . my Paradise, not the background scenery for the comedy of life. And that I find difficult to discover in Dickens-land.

Let us see, now, how the geography of Dickens' country pans out. It is not of great extent geographically. In this respect it is unlike that of Scott, which, apart from embracing several continental tracts and wide and far regions of the East, reaches from the Shetland Isles to Dover Cliffs; or that of Stevenson, which occupies so much of the Scottish east and west, and straggles into England and over to Flanders and down into France, and then throws long, thin, shining tentacles across the United States, from the Adirondacks to San Francisco, and thence across the Pacific to Samoa and the far isles; or that of Thackeray which lies "beyond London," embracing as it does Ireland and Virginia. It is, in a word, rather a huge county than a country. It may be described as lying between the marches of York and Durham counties on the north, and Portsmouth and the nose of Kent on the south; between Salisbury Plain, Warwick and Leamington on the west, and the sea-beaches of Suffolk and the Thames and Medway estuaries of the east.

A glance at the outline map herewith will bring this quicker to the reader's realization. But now just a word on the neglected literary side of Dickens' life-work.

Perhaps no more striking instance of the influence of Dickens, not only in France but in Germany, is to hand than a recent noteworthy article by M. Teodor de Wyzewa in the Revue des Deux Mondes, on a remarkable romance by the German novelist, Gustaf Frenssen.* After a brief summary of the German romance and of its leading personages, the critic adds:

But, it will be said, why do you thus recommend to us personages whom we have long known and loved under familiar English names? Your Joern Uhl is really called David Copperfield; the simple-natured and heroic Thiess Thiessen is, in truth, Dan'l Peggotty. The friend of his childhood whom the hero finally marries is not Lisbeth Junker, but Agnes Wickfield. Dora is the true name of the child-woman. And as to the uncle who sets out to find his seduced and abandoned niece, do we not at once recognise him as Peggotty's brother? All these folk of M. Frenssen are already old acquaintances, and it is in fact over half a century ago since Dickens moved us with the tale of their lives

Thereafter, having indicated where Gustaf Frenssen's book is none the less a genuine new book, within its own inspiration and style, M. de Wyzewa adds: Yet none could question from David Copperfield. The author finds his inspiration in Dickens, as, before him, Theodore Storm found it, as the still more famous Fritz Reuter found it, as Freytag himself found it, to leave unspecified a score other popular German writers. And, in truth, the present opportunity is one wherein to testify once more to the extraordinary influence exercised throughout the whole of Europe by the author of David Copperfield and Martin Chuzzlewit. While the majority of his compatriots appear to see in him only an inimitable comedian, not only France and Germany but Russia have gained abundantly from the central wellspring of his genius. When the History of Modern Romance in the second half of the Nineteenth Century comes to be written, “le nom de Dickens devra se trouver en tete de chacun des chapitres.”

I would recommend the literary student to read this short but suggestive article by M. de Wyzewa. The time is assuredly come when Dickens ought to be more understandingly appreciated. Relative neglect or indifference on the part of the small “reading world” (as distinct from the mainly indiscriminating public) has been succeeded by spasmodic eulogy as futile in kind. I cannot recall any English critic on Dickens who has written more discerningly on the novelist’s achievement as a whole, than M. de Wyzewa writes in the etude to which I have here drawn attention, and from which I am tempted to make this further brief excerpt:

The work of Dickens is so rich and variegated that different races have differently understood and enjoyed. To his Russian readers, for example, he is above all the creator of Little Nell, the poet of the scorned and the downtrodden: and it is in this respect he has been the master of Dostoievsky and Tolstoi — and it would be a curiously suggestive study to discover in what way and to what extent Dickens’ profoundly Christian spirit acted on the opposite temperaments of these two writers. For his French readers, on the other hand, he is the paramount revealer of a realism at once minute in detail and vivid in synthesis (“un realisme minutieux et vivant?”) . . . and, to them, seems to have no notable followers among the English novelists of to-day. But it is in Germany, perhaps, that his influence has been most potent. ... In the work of Dickens the foremost German novelists of to-day appear to have discerned, above all else, the veritable types and models of contemporary romance.

Apropos of this foreign appreciation, I wonder if any of my readers has attempted a “foreign Dickens collection”? In a fit of aberration I tried it once. It was not (at first) the number of translations that daunted me: many French and a few German I expected. I hailed gladly a Portuguese “Senhor Martinho da Londra” in lieu of our friend Chuzzlewit, and welcomed an Italian edition of some of the Sketches by Boz under the title “Il Mistero di Orazio Sparkins.” But when it came to Polish and Russian I faltered. I had, indeed, already ingloriously withdrawn, when, from “Kjobenhavn” arrived a “Pickwick” yclept “Udtog af Pikvik-Klubbens.” For a moment I rallied, but a mystery in Muscovite finished me. Even long afterward I knew no return of the craze, when a friend sent me from Prague a horrid-looking imprint of “eweckzey” consonants, with the (kindly meant) intimation that Cvrcek u Krbu was the Czech for “The Cricket on the Hearth.”

I have not, I regret to say, yet had time to read Cvrcek u Krbu.

A CHRISTMAS CAROL

By Charles Dickens and Toby, M.P.

From: Punch, December 25, 1901, p.451-452

No. 10, Downing Street; Christmas Eve. — PRINCE ARTHUR, turning out of Parliament Street, walked along Downing Street with long stride, arms limply hung by his side, hat slightly tilted back from his feverish brow. Left in town at this festive time to look after the affairs of the nation, he had spent a tiring day at his desk. The night was in unison with his faltering spirits. Fog and frost hung over the street. Ghostly figures, suddenly emerging from the mist, sharply scanned him. They turned out to be policemen, who wondered what he was doing out on such a night, and it Christmas Eve.

Arrived at No. 10, he fumbled at the key-hole in vain attempt to insert his latch-key. Now it is a fact that there was nothing at all particular about the knocker on the door, except that it was very large. It is also a fact that

PRINCE ARTHUR had seen it night and morning all through his official residence. Let it also be borne in mind that throughout the day he had not bestowed one thought upon OLD MORALITY. And then let any man explain, if he can, how it happened that Prince Arthur, having his key in the lock of the door, saw in the knocker, without its undergoing any intermediate process of change, not a knocker but OLD MORALITY'S face!

OLD MORALITY'S face. It was not in impenetrable shadow as the front of No. 10, Downing Street was. It had a faint flicker upon it such as might fall on an upturned countenance from the dying' light in the glass roof in the House of Commons when members answer to the cry "Who goes home?" It looked at PRINCE ARTHUR as OLD MORALITY used to look, with kindly but shrewd glance, as if doubting whether he were altogether, as he has described himself, "a child" in some matters. The hair (what was left of it) was curiously stirred, as if by breath or hot air; and though the eyes were wide open they were perfectly motionless.

As PRINCE ARTHUR looked fixedly at this phenomenon it was a knocker again.

To say he was not startled, or that his blood was not conscious of a terrible sensation to which it had been a stranger from infancy — an earlier stage from that of the childhood alluded to — would be untrue. But he thrust the key into the key-hole, turned it sturdily, walked in and lighted his candle.

He made his way to the room nearest the doorway connecting No. 10 with No. 11, Downing Street. This was knocked through at the instance of the SQUIRE OF MALWOOD when he was CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, and LORD ROSEBERY, as Prime Minister, was his neighbour. He (the SQUIRE) liked to feel that at any moment, without the delay consequent upon passing out of one front door and through another, he could seek and find the counsel and companionship of his chief.

PRINCE ARTHUR thought of this touching incident with a sense of relief. He was alone in the house. All the servants were making Christmas holiday.

It was nice to think that by passing through a door he could, in case anything happened, be in the next house in no time.

"Pooh pooh! " he said, when he thought of OLD MORALITY'S face where the door-knocker ought to have been. Nevertheless, he doubled-locked the door. Thus secured against surprise, he took off his turned-down collar, put on his dressing-gown and his slippers and his nightcap, and sat down before the fire to sup the gruel which the prevision of a faithful servant had left ready on the hob.

Half-an-hour passed; it may have been only twenty-five minutes. PRINCE ARTHUR heard a familiar step in the passage. It was coming straight towards the door. Whilst he was congratulating himself on the precaution he had taken of double locking it, the Something moved on through the massive door and entered the room. The dying flame leaped up as though it cried, "I know him; OLD MORALITY'S Ghost!" and fell again.

The same face; the very same. OLD MORALITY in his square morning coat, his usual waistcoat, his trousers of the last century, and boots of the same date. His body was transparent, so that PRINCE ARTHUR, looking through his waistcoat, could clearly see the bookstall at Charing Cross loaded with those newspapers he never reads.

"How now?" growled PRINCE ARTHUR, throwing into his voice a tone of Philosophic Doubt. "What do you want with me?"

"Much." OLD MORALITY'S voice; no doubt about it.

"Who are you?"

"In life I was First Lord of the Treasury and Leader of the House of Commons whilst you were Chief Secretary for Ireland."

"Can you — can you sit down?" asked PRINCE ARTHUR, looking doubtfully at him.

The Ghost sat down on the opposite side of the fireplace as if he were quite used to it.

"Don't be frightened," he said genially, warming his hands at the fire and rubbing his leg in the place where the calf formerly was. "I daresay you didn't expect me. I can't stay long, though I don't suppose you are much troubled with cock-crowing in Downing Street. I just wanted to have a little chat with you about Procedure in the Commons. I hear something about you going to tighten up the Rules so as to choke off Obstruction. I don't want to say anything disagreeable. Merry Christmas: good-will on earth, and all that, you know. So I won't refer to the time when you and GRANDOLPH and WOLFFEY and JOHN GORST — how's GORST getting on? still respectful to his Chiefs, I suppose? — when you four did your best to make legislation impossible.

“What I wanted to say to you is — if I may quote a copy-book heading possibly not unfamiliar to you — when yon put your hand to the plough, don’t turn back. No half measures: fill the flowing bowl: you know what I mean. I did something in my time to deliver the majority from the tyranny of the minority. Never had such a chance as you possess. You have an overwhelming majority. The Irish Party, under the leadership of a pinchbeck PARNELL, have given themselves away, alienated public opinion by openly declaring their intention of making the House of Commons a byword among Parliaments, impotent, ludicrous. Now’s your time. Snatch it and do your work thoroughly.”

PRINCE ARTHUR began to feel quite at home. Had never heard a ghost talk in so sensible a manner, or comport itself in such homely fashion.

“Well,” he said, “though unexpected, as you put it, I’m very glad to see you again. Won’t you take something?” lie was about to add when, catching a glimpse of the back of the chair through the lower part of his visitor’s waistcoat, he recognised the inappropriateness of the suggestion.

As he looked OLD MORALITY edged towards the corner of the seat, placed his hands on his knees and turned his head to the left in the direction where the Speaker’s chair is viewed from the Treasury Bench.

“He’s going to pounce!” cried PRINCE ARTHUR excitedly.

Pounce he did, clear off his chair, through the shut and double-locked door. PRINCE ARTHUR, his faculties strangely quickened, could hear the pattering of his feet along the passage.

“Pooh pooh!” he muttered as he finished his gruel, “I don’t believe my own eyes. No Foundations for Belief in this sort of thing. All the same there’s a good deal in what he said.”

THE FINAL STAVE OF “A Christmas Carol”

(With profound apologies to the Genius of Charles Dickens)

By F.A.

From: Punch, December 20, 1905, p.437-438

STAVE FIVE.

Scrooge was certainly under the impression, on going to bed after returning from that wonderful Christmas party at his nephew's, that he would not be required to have any further intercourse with Spirits, and would live henceforth on the Total Abstinence Principle.

But in this he was mistaken. There was no doubt about that. For barely, or so it seemed to him, had he laid his head on his pillow, when the curtains of his bed were once more drawn aside by a spectral hand.

However, on this occasion, he felt no solemn dread. Not a bit of it! On the contrary, he skipped out of bed as lively as a sandboy — or rather several dozen sandboys, every one of them endowed with preternatural agility.

“I know what you're here for,” he chuckled. “Come to take me out to some more Christmas Parties, eh? All right, I'm ready for you. I feel equal to facing any number of them now!”

“I am the Ghost of Christmas more than sixty years to come,” announced the Spirit in sepulchral tones.

“My dear Sir,” said Scrooge heartily, “delighted to see you — de-lighted! Thank'ee. Let us be off at once. Do we go out of the window, or through the wall, this time? Whichever it is, Spirit, lead on, and I shall be most happy to follow you anywhere you like!”

“Touch my robe!”

Scrooge did as he was told, and held it fast. The city had entirely vanished; they stood upon an open country road, before some tall wrought iron gates, flanked by pillars, upon which a pair of heraldic griffins ramped

— but amiably, as if even their stone hearts were softened somewhat by the influence of the Season. Through these gates they passed, and up a stately avenue to the portico of a noble mansion.

“One of the country seats of Lord Bredanbourne,” the Ghost explained.

“But why bring me to such a place, Spirit?” asked Scrooge, feeling slightly puzzled. “For really I can’t recollect ever to have heard of his lordship.”

“Have you so soon forgotten your fellow ‘prentice, Dick Wilkins?” inquired the Spirit. “He married, as you are doubtless aware, the eldest Miss Fezziwig, and died Sir Richard Wilkins, having been knighted during his Lord Mayoralty by His Gracious Majesty, King William The Fourth.”

“So he was,” cried Scrooge. “Bless his heart! So he was! Dear, dear! And yet, even now, I don’t quite”

“His son, Gabriel,” pursued the Phantom (who, by the way, was less reserved than any of its forerunners) “developed the warehousing connection of the firm of Fezziwig & Wilkins to such a prodigious extent that he eventually became a Baronet. The second Baronet, Sir Peveril, in return for important services rendered to his party, was raised to the Peerage under the title of Baron Bredanbourne.”

“Bless my soul!” exclaimed Scrooge, rather impressed, “what services, Spirit?”

But the Phantom answered not. It is very possible that it did not know.

“The Lord Bredanbourne of the period we are now in,” it continued, “does nothing whatever but enjoy himself. He is at this particular moment entertaining a houseful of the smartest people in London for Christmas week.”

“Is he, though?” cried Scrooge, rubbing his hands with the delight of a boy. “What a feast he must be giving them, eh, Spirit? What a capital Turkey! What a wonderful Pudding! What bowls of seething Bishop! What pyramids of oranges and piles of chestnuts! Do let us go inside and look on, Spirit! Just for an hour or so!”

“I fancy they will have finished feasting by this time,” said the Spirit. “We shall probably find them all in the Long Drawing-room, playing”

““ Forfeits, I’ll be bound!” said Scrooge, eagerly. “Oh, I must go in, and see the fun! Make haste, Spirit, make haste! Hallo here! Whoop!”

Unseen by any there, they entered that lofty and splendid room — but scarce had they done so, ere Scrooge’s heart grew strangely chill within him.

The walls were decked with Christmas here and there, but yet resounded to no echoing ring of joyous Christmas laughter. Scrooge noted next that all these guests who sat, in groups of four, at little tables were so deep engrossed in studying the cards that fell — in such a solemn silence, too! — that they were blind and deaf to aught besides, unheeding holly — aye, and mistletoe! From time to time a hollow voice would cry, “I leave it!” Or one would quit his seat and wander around, like some uneasy soul that finds no rest, and then return, as powerless to resist the spell for long! Young girls there were, who, risking stakes that they could ill afford, doubled “No trumps,” and paled as Dummy’s hand, displayed, revealed the guarded King that doomed them to inevitable disaster!

“I suppose, Spirit,” said Scrooge, “they’ll have in the fiddles and begin to enjoy themselves presently, eh? They can’t keep up this sort of thing much longer! can they?”

“They are enjoying themselves,” replied the Phantom. “And they will keep it up till one or two in the morning, at least.”

“Then I don’t wish to see any more,” said Scrooge. “Remove me, Spirit. Let me see my dear nephew’s descendants keeping up this Festival in the time-honoured fashion with ‘How, when, and where,’ and ‘Blind-man’s buff.’”

Back to the town the Spirit led him next, and to a fine house in a terrace hard by the spot where Tyburn Tree once bore its ghastly fruit. There might have been a dozen people, old and young, in the solidly furnished drawing-room Scrooge and the Spirit visited next — but not one among them all was engaged in blind-man’s buff! He saw the same small tables, with similar unsmiling parties of four seated at each — the very silence might have been the same! In one group Scrooge particularly noticed a grim hatchet-faced elderly gentleman who somehow rather reminded him of his former self. “Your great - nephew, Mr. Justice Merryweather,” explained the Phantom; “he is more learned, though perhaps slightly less genial, than his Early-Victorian father. That pallid young gentleman whose play he is just criticising with such refreshing candour is Ms great-nephew by marriage, young Topper, who has lately been called to the Bar, and has a case — his first brief — coming on in his relative’s court early next Hilary term. He has just remembered that circumstance.”

“Spirit, show me no more!” entreated Scrooge, “I cannot bear it. In mercy’s name take me from this hideous travesty of Christmas cheer to some humbler home, where all the dear old customs are not quite forgot! Let us drop in upon the descendants of my worthy clerk, Bob Cratchit! For I tell you plainly, unless I smell roast goose and hot punch, and hear a toast proposed, if not a song, within the next few minutes, I have a feeling that I might relapse into the man that I was wont to be!”

The Phantom inclined its head.... Their way led them past a row of spacious shops, above which Scrooge could read, in bold and glittering letters, the words, “Cratchit’s Cash Stores, Limited.”

“Yes,” remarked the Spirit airily, “the Cratchits have got on, too. The business is vastly improved since old Peter Cratchit first founded it in the early sixties. . . . No, the present people don’t live over the shop; they occupy a villa residence called ‘Chatsworth,’ in a new but highly select suburb, where they are known as the ‘De Crespigny-Cratchits.’”

To this suburb they repaired. But, as Scrooge passed through the stained-glass portal, his nostrils were not greeted by the savour for which he hungered, Mrs. De Crespigny-Cratchit being much too refined a woman to allow a roast goose to appear at her table, whether with or without such ungenteel appurtenances as sage and onions.

The party he found in the “Art” Drawing-room to the right of the hall were all in the most correct evening costume, and far too fashionable to be festive. They passed no punch around, proposed no toasts, nor sang a single song. On the contrary, they were engaged in precisely the same occupation as were the two parties at which Scrooge had previously assisted.

“Spirit, I can’t stand it!” cried Scrooge. “In Heaven’s name, what is this fell pursuit that, in the space of sixty-odd short years, will banish harmless mirth and jollity from every hearth alike?”....”They will call it ‘ Bridge,’“ the Spirit answered.

“Ghost of the Future,” cried Scrooge, quite agonised, “I fear you more than any Spectre I have seen! You seem to delight to torture me! If there is any respectable home in the town on which this fearful blight has not yet fallen, show that home to me, Spirit, I beseech you!”

“I cannot do so,” was the Phantom’s sorrowful reply, “for I know of none!”

“Then, for the love of Pity,” Scrooge implored it, “conduct me back to bed — and let me wake, to feel all this is but a dreadful dream!”

This time his prayer was granted. . . . He positively frisked out of bed next morning. Why, bless me, it’s Boxing Day!” he shouted. “What ridiculous nonsense I’ve been dreaming! Christmas blighted, indeed! And by a thing called ‘ Bridge,’ too! Pooh!! Stuff!!! That punch at my nephew’s last night must have been stronger than I fancied!”

“PHIZ” A MEMOIR

From Punch, July 22nd, 1882.

“Phiz.”

HABLOT K. BROWNE, Artist. Born, 1815. Died, July, 1882.

The Lamp is out that lighted up the text
Of Dickens, Lever — heroes of the pen.
Pickwick and Lorrequer we love, but next
We place the man who made us see such men.
What should we know of Martin Chuzzlewit,
Stern Mr. Dombey, or Uriah Heep?
Tom Burke of Ours? — Around our hearths they sit,
Outliving their creators — all asleep!
No sweeter gift ere fell to man than his
Who gave us troops of friends — delightful Phiz!
He is not dead! There in the picture-book
He lives with men and women that he drew;
We take him with us to the cozy nook
Where old companions we can love anew.
Dear boyhood’s friend! We rode with him to hounds;
Lived with dear Peggotty in after years;
Missed in old Ireland where fun knew no bounds;
At Dora’s death we felt poor David’s tears!
There is no death for such a man — he is
The spirit of an unclosed book! immortal Phiz!

“PHIZ”

PREFACE.

Taking into consideration the ability of the Artist whose name has become identified with the works of Dickens, of Lever, and of Ainsworth; and who has contributed in the course of the present century more largely (perhaps with the single exception of Cruikshank) to the embellishment of popular books than any other known illustrator; it would seem an inexcusable omission, almost amounting to neglect, if the life and labours of the late Hablot Knight Browne met with no more worthy recognition than the fleeting comments of the daily press.

Such, at least, is my opinion; and as a humble tribute to the memory of an able and industrious draughtsman, and fertile designer, I place on record the more generally interesting particulars of an honourable and exemplary career.

To Mr. W. G. Browne and Dr. Edgar Browne, sons of the deceased artist, my best thanks are due for a kindly interest in my work, manifested more especially by the loan of many interesting letters dashed off on various occasions by "Phiz" in the wildest spirit of fun; and a willing consent to their appearance in print.

I have also to acknowledge the courtesy of Messrs. H. Sotheran & Co., for permission to copy for publication a few letters written by "Phiz" to Charles Dickens, which are now published for the first time. For the Portrait (copied from a photograph, perhaps the best of the very few now in existence) I am indebted to the Proprietors of The Graphic.

And lastly, the Author desires to associate with this brochure the name of his friend, Mr. George Redway, who has rendered much valuable assistance in bringing it before the public.

“PHIZ” (H. K. BROWNE) A MEMOIR.

“Fizz, Whizz, or something of that sort,” humorous Tom Hood would say, when trying to recall the pseudonym that has since become so familiar by means of the innumerable works of art to which it was appended. At the time Hablot Knight Browne first used this quaint soubriquet, it was customary to look upon book-illustrators as second, or even third-rate artists — mere hacks in fact; and for this reason they usually suppressed their real names, in order to give themselves the opportunity of earning the title of artist, when producing more ambitious results as painters. Occasionally, whether by accident or design, the subject of this memoir would affix his real name to his illustrations; and the public were consequently under the impression that the two signatures were those of different artists, and were even wont to remark that “Browne’s work was better than that of ‘Phiz!’”

It is not, perhaps, generally known that the artist’s first nom de crayon was “Nemo,” which to some extent bears out the above statement that a book-illustrator was considered a “nobody.” Mr. Browne himself, in referring to the Pickwick Papers, gave the following explanation: — “I think I signed myself as ‘Nemo’ to my first etchings (those of No. 4) before adopting ‘Phiz’ as my soubriquet, to harmonize — I suppose — better with Dickens’ ‘Boz.’” It is only on the earliest printed plates in some copies of the Pickwick Papers that the signature of “Nemo” can be faintly traced.

Hablot Knight Browne, son of William Loder Browne, a descendant from a Norfolk family, was born on the 12th of July, 1815, at Kennington, London. He was educated at a private school in Norfolk, and from an early age evinced a taste for drawing, which, being recognized by his relatives, induced them to apprentice him to Finden, the well-known line-engraver. An anecdote is told of him during his apprenticeship which will bear repetition. Finding Browne very painstaking and conscientious, his master usually sent him with engraved plates to the printer, in order that he might superintend the operation of proof-taking. As printers usually take their own time over such matters, the youth found that this waiting the pressman’s pleasure tried his patience too much. It therefore occurred to him that to spend the interval in the British Museum, hard by, would be much more suited to his tastes. On his returning with the proofs, Finden would praise the boy’s diligence, little thinking what trick had been practised on him.

Line-engraving, however, did not find much favour with the future “Phiz,” the process being too tedious; for Finden would probably occupy some weeks to produce a small plate, which by the quicker process of etching, could have been executed in as many hours. He accordingly suspended operations in that quarter, and, in conjunction with a young kindred spirit, hired a small attic, and employed his time in the more fascinating pursuit of water-colour drawing, which he continued to follow with remarkable assiduity until a few days before his death.

These juvenile disciples of the brush then worked hard at drawing in colour. Browne paid his share of the rent in drawings, which he produced rapidly; indeed, there was a solemn compact between the co-workers to “do three a day” — they subsisting, meanwhile, on the simplest fare. At this time he attended the evening class at the “Life” School in St. Martin’s Lane, and was a fellow-pupil with Etty, the famous painter of the “nude.” It was Browne’s great delight to watch this talented student at work, and he considerably neglected his own studies in consequence.

At the age of seventeen, or thereabouts, he succeeded in gaining a medal offered for competition by the Society of Arts for the best representation of an historical subject; and was again fortunate in obtaining a prize, from the same Society, for a large etching of “John Gilpin.” Mr. George Augustus Sala, himself an artist of no small ability, remembers to have seen, in a shop-window in Wardour Street, a certain print by a young man named Hablot Browne, representing the involuntary flight of John Gilpin, scattering the pigs and poultry in his never-to-be-forgotten ride.

By the time he had attained his twentieth year he had acquired considerable facility with the pencil. Charles Dickens, but three years his senior, and with whom the name of "Phiz" is inseparably connected, had just then made a wonderful reputation by his "Sketches," which first appeared, at intervals, during 1834-5, and were afterwards published in book form, illustrated by the renowned George Cruikshank.

In 1836, there appeared in print a pamphlet of some forty or fifty pages, entitled Sunday under Three Heads — As it is; as Sabbath Bills would make it; as it might be made; "By Timothy Sparks; illustrated by H. K. B.;" and dedicated to the Bishop of London. The author was Charles Dickens, whose satire was levelled at Sir Andrew Agnew and the extreme Sabbatarian party, and had immediate reference to a bill "for the better observance of the Sabbath," which the House of Commons had recently thrown out by a small majority. The illustrations in this little work were drawn by Hablot Browne, and are very choice examples of wood-engraving of the school that existed half a century ago. Its original price was one shilling, but having become very scarce, it is now worth more than its weight in gold.

These early productions of Browne's pencil at once introduced him to public notice, and Dickens showed his appreciation of their excellence by selecting him as the illustrator of the Pickwick Papers, which appeared during the early part of that year. It is well known to the readers of Forster's

Life of Dickens, that the idea of "Pickwick" was suggested to the author by Robert Seymour, whose tastes induced him to etch a few plates of sporting subjects to which Dickens was to supply the text. Thus commenced that immortal work known as The Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club. Seymour produced seven illustrations, when he committed suicide, which obliged the publishers to make arrangements with another artist. R. W. Buss succeeded Seymour, and etched two plates, which Dickens, who had by this time assumed the control of the work, thought so unsatisfactory (as indeed they were), that he declined his further services. Here a fresh opening was created, and William Makepeace Thackeray competed with Hablot Knight Browne for the post; both submitting to Dickens' inspection some specimens of their work.

The choice fell upon "Phiz," the artist whose ability has so admirably proved the wisdom of the selection; and Thackeray thereupon determined to adopt another profession, with what happy results let Esmond testify. Who could say whether Vanity Fair would ever have been written had this mighty penman been chosen to succeed Buss? It is curious to note Thackeray's great anxiety to become an artist; he even went abroad to study, but Sala tells us that "Mr. Thackeray drew, perhaps, rather worse than he had done before beginning his continental studies, although at that time he actually supplied a series of etchings to illustrate Douglas Jerrold's Men of Character, which were prodigies of badness."

When "Phiz" had been selected as the illustrator of the Pickwick Papers, his generous rival was the first to tell him the good news, and offer his congratulations.

"Phiz" may now be said to have fairly commenced his career as a book-illustrator. His sense of humour corresponded so exactly with that of Dickens, that a mere suggestion enabled him to vividly represent the scenes described by the author. It has been remarked (and truly) that in many cases the plates do not correspond with the text; but this can be accounted for. Dickens, then an enthusiastic young author, and somewhat impetuous in his demands for drawings, would arrive unexpectedly at Browne's studio, hurriedly read a few pages of manuscript, and exclaiming, "Now, I want you to illustrate that," would take an abrupt departure, carrying the manuscript off with him. As soon as the artist could collect his faculties, he would try to recall the scene so hastily described, and endeavour to put it on paper. Dickens himself, in his preface to the Pickwick Papers, gives a similar explanation, viz. — "It is due to the gentleman, whose designs accompany the letterpress, to state that the interval has been so short between the production of each number in manuscript and its appearance in print, that the greater portion of the illustrations have been executed by the artist from the author's verbal description of what he intended to write." It is therefore not surprising that a few errors, in such details as the number of boys in a procession, or the dress of an individual, should occur.

Of Dickens' Novels, Martin Chuzzlewit contains, perhaps, our etcher's most vigorous productions, but the small woodcut illustrations in Master Humphrey's Clock are very praiseworthy, and without doubt conducted greatly to the popularity of the book.

The illustrations in the Pickwick Papers are on the whole inferior to many which "Phiz" subsequently executed. But an exception must be made in favour of the artist's realization of the character of Sam Weller, than which, even Seymour's happy invention of Mr. Pickwick did not more effectually ensure the popularity of Dickens' comic epic and give it a "deathless date."

The extraordinary demand for copies of the Pickwick Papers necessitated a re-etching of the copper-plates, which, owing to friction caused by the printer's hand, had become very much worn. This reproduction will account for any slight difference in the details of the illustrations; for the repetition of subjects once etched, was a task by no means congenial to the artist; and this no doubt induced him to say, some years afterwards, in a letter to one of his sons, "O! I'm a' weary, I'm a' weary of this illustrating business."

Artists frequently experience great difficulty in realizing, to the author's satisfaction, the description of scenes and characters. An illustration is here given showing Browne's various "fancies for Mr. Dombey," all of which failed to please Dickens, who also expressed his disapprobation of this artist's treatment of another subject in Dombey and Son. "I am really distressed," writes he, "by the illustration of Mrs. Pipchin and Paul. It is so frightfully and wildly wide of the mark. Good Heaven! in the commonest and most literal construction of the text, it is all wrong. She is described as an old lady, and Paul's 'miniature arm-chair' is mentioned more than once. He ought to be sitting in a little arm-chair down in the corner of the fire-place, staring up at her. I can't say what pain and vexation it is to be so utterly misrepresented. I would cheerfully have given a hundred pounds to have kept this illustration out of the book. He never could have got that idea of Mrs. Pipchin if he had attended to the text. Indeed, I think he does better without the text; for then the notion is made easy to him in short description, and he can't help taking it in."

As the tale proceeded, the artist more than compensated for his unsuccessful rendering of this incident; and with "Micawber," in David Copperfield, he obtained the author's entire approbation, who says, "Browne has sketched an uncommonly characteristic and capital Mr. Micawber for the next number." Again, with reference to an illustration in Bleak House, "Browne has done Skimpole, and helped to make him singularly unlike the great original."

Of the private life of "Phiz" little is known. His extreme nervousness and dislike to publicity was often misconstrued as pride; and Dickens even had considerable difficulty in occasionally persuading him to meet a few friends and spend a pleasant evening. When he did accept such invitations, he invariably tried to seclude himself in a corner of the room, or behind a curtain. His desire for a quiet, unobtrusive life, induced him to pass most of his time in country retirement, all business matters in town being transacted by an intimate friend. Authors or publishers wishing to have a personal interview with "Phiz" were compelled to visit him at his residence, a few miles from town, and many were the contretemps on dark nights as they crossed a bleak moor to reach their destination. His sons looked forward to the time when visitors were expected, in order to hear the stories of wild adventure which generally befell them, and to laugh at their discomfiture.

“Phiz” had been from his boyhood accustomed to horses, and frequently hunted with the Surrey hounds. To this circumstance is due the extreme facility with which he delineated the horse in action in the hunting field and elsewhere. At one time he contributed sketches to The Sporting Gazette. This industrious artist was never known to take a lengthened holiday, but occasionally spent a few days at the seaside, where, no doubt, his pencil was fully employed. A letter, written while staying at Margate, to his son Mr. Walter G. Browne (whom, for some unknown reason he styled “Doctor”), shows his innate sense of humour.

Tuesday, June 19, 6a, Crescent Place, Margate.

My dear Dr.,

“I hve my W. C. White: — but I have no white collars — and as I am swelling it about without a necktie — mine having mysteriously disappeared, left behind in a bath probably — perhaps it would be coming it too strong to appear without collars also, and it is hardly warm enough for it either. Your P.O. is from the Miscellany — to H. K. Browne — from Mr. Barrett — Xtian name unknown — and no matter. Any blocks that come, forward on. Send me a * * * * * before I return. I did some very good shades myself — of myself — unconsciously — yesterday evening. The baths run along one side of the High Street, flush with the pavement — and I found when I had nearly finished my toilet that the gas-burner was so ingeniously placed, that it was impossible for any bather to avoid casting gigantic studies of the nude upon the window blind. — This sort of thing. —

[Here follow several other sketches of the bather in various attitudes].

His appreciation of fun is thus referred to by Dickens in a letter to Mrs. Dickens, dating from the Lion Hotel, Shrewsbury. "Thursday, Nov. 1st, 1838. — We were at the play last night. It was a bespeak — 'The Love Chase,' a ballet (with a phenomenon!), divers songs, and 'A Roland for an Oliver.' It is a good theatre, but the actors are very funny. Browne laughed with such indecent heartiness at one point of the entertainment, that an old gentleman in the next box suffered the most violent indignation."

In 1837, "Phiz" accompanied Dickens to Flanders, for a ten days' summer holiday; and in 1838 they went to Yorkshire, a journey which resulted in the production of Nicholas Nickleby.

The following year he made one of a party of four, and visited, with Dickens, Macready and Forster, nearly all the London prisons. These joint tours of Author and Artist could not fail to assist the realization of the scenes they intended to depict.

It is an interesting fact in connection with the career of "Phiz," that he would never agree to draw from the living model, — all his representations of moving crowds, and the various types of humanity, which his etchings exhibit, being drawn from recollection. He would sometimes make a few jottings in pencil — mere memoranda — when anything struck him as being worthy of reproduction, but beyond that he depended on his excellent memory. For example, he would go to Epsom on the Derby Day without taking a pencil even, and, on returning home, would draw to the life exact portraits of any conspicuous or eccentric character he had seen on the course.

As previously stated, Browne was extremely fond of water-colour drawing, and executed some thousands during his life; not unfrequently a day's work would be represented by three or four of these productions. They were not caricatures, as one might suppose, but rural scenes à la Watteau, and allegorical subjects. This fact controverts the statement made in a daily paper, that "unfortunately, without a text to illustrate, 'Phiz' never had half-a-dozen ideas in his head" (!). For many years he was a constant contributor of pictures — figure subjects of a humorous and dramatic character — to the Exhibitions of the British Institution, and of the Society of British Artists. Among his more ambitious efforts was a cartoon of considerable dimensions, representing "A Foraging Party of Cæsar's Forces surprised by the Britons," which appeared as No. 65 at the Westminster Hall Exhibition of 1843. This, notwithstanding the "scratchy" manner of its execution, displayed remarkable skill and abundant energy of design. At the same gathering another cartoon was attributed to him, of which the energy bordered on caricature; it was named, "Henry II defied by a Welsh Mountaineer."

At one time “Phiz” received an extraordinary commission to reproduce in water-colour all his illustrations to the Novels of Dickens. The Artist reminded his patron of the magnitude of the undertaking, but the request was persisted in, and the work duly executed.

His love of bracing air induced him to pay frequent visits to the seaside; but on one occasion he lodged in a house not remarkable for its odoriferous nature; and, in order to produce a current of fresh air in his bed-room, he opened door and window, and slept in the draught caused thereby. For many years before his death, he suffered from incipient paralysis, the result, no doubt, of this incautious act, and to which may be attributed his disappearance from the art world some fifteen years ago.

“Phiz,” notwithstanding his crippled condition, still worked hard with admirable perseverance, though his difficulties were increased by an injury to his thumb, which compelled him to hold his pencil between the middle and fore fingers. His friends endeavoured to persuade him to draw his pictures on a larger scale, in order that they might be photographed to the required dimensions, but, with one or two exceptions, he refused to act on this suggestion. He gradually lost that facility which characterized his work, and latterly yielded to proposals to illustrate boys’ literature of a rather low class.

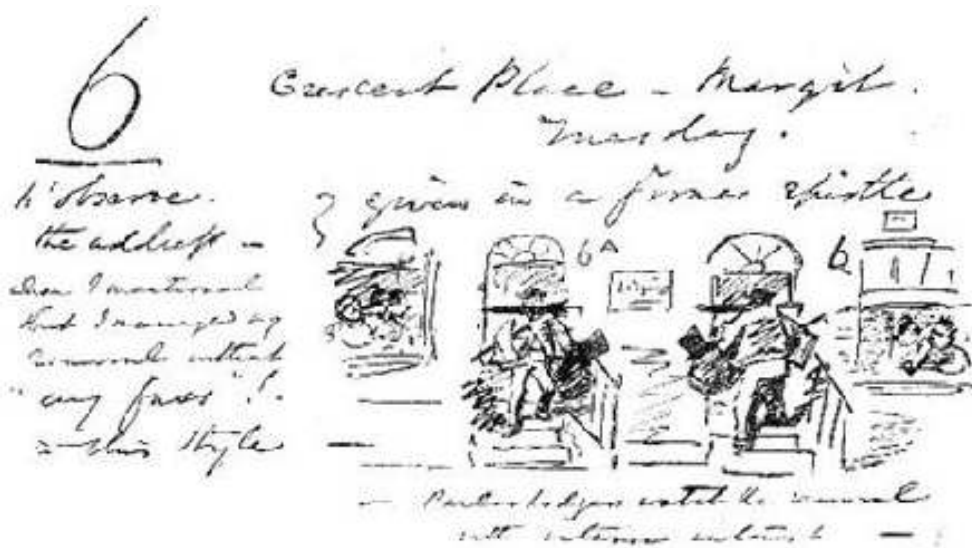

The time is past, no doubt, which encouraged the method of book-illustration adopted by "Phiz." It has given place to wood-engraving, and multifarious phototypic processes, that, perhaps, are commercially preferable, but from an artistic standpoint much inferior. We must, however, except the wonderful results some wood-engravers have produced from time to time, which etchers, even, cannot hope to excel.

Dr. Edgar Browne describes his father's indifference to the value of his work, or the time and labour bestowed upon it: — "He never understood the art of husbanding or developing his powers, — he never set to work to learn any technical process; when he had a little leisure from 'illustration' work, he used to start a picture 'to get his hand in' — generally taking some unimportant or trivial subject for this purpose. His facility of hand both in large and minute work was something marvellous. At one time, he produced a very remarkable series of sketches in chalk made during a tour in Ireland. They are scattered now, but are as fine as anything he did, and are certainly the best records of a people who have practically vanished. He was astonishingly careless about his work. Hundreds of original designs were thrown into the waste-paper basket; apart from their local interest similar sketches have found willing purchasers of late years."

Like many other artists whose pecuniary reward had not been commensurate with their ability, he became the recipient of a pension. The kind instrumentality of a few Royal Academicians obtained for him an annual grant which had been previously enjoyed by the late George Cruikshank.

On the 8th of July, 1882, the death occurred of the famous "Phiz." At the quiet village of Hove, near Brighton, where the last few years of his life were spent, he succumbed in his sixty-seventh year to infirmity rather than old age. Almost forgotten as a man, his productions have remained in our memories, and will continue to do so as long as the works of Dickens and Lever are read and appreciated. His remains were interred at the extra-mural Cemetery, Brighton. The funeral was private, the only mourners present being the four sons of the deceased, Dr. Ambler, Mr. George Halse, and Mr. Robert Harrison.

As admirers of his artistic ability we place this Memoir as a wreath upon his grave.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The following letters were addressed by the artist-humorist to his son, Mr. Walter Gr. Browne: —

Blenheim Crescent, Sept., Saturday, 3 o'clk. p.m., a.d. 1867.

My Dear Dr.,

I have nearly bursted my heart out, and proved, that my soul or soles (I have two) is'nt — or an't — immortal, — by wearing on 'em out running to and fro after yr. Balmorals — Bootless errands! The wretched slave (of awl) has but just brought them! I bristle with wrath! and could welt him! — but — no — I won't — he may want his calf's skin whole, to mend his own Bad-morals!!

I rush! I fly! to the Gt. W. R. Station! — — !!!!

I sink — breathless into the arms of the astounded clerk — point to the boots — —

My-mouth faintly whispers “Wey-mouth in his pen-adorned Ear!!” and — and — ”Bless me! where am I?” — and, and — I wish — you may get ‘em!

If you visit Portland again, make a note of any peculiarities of spot — convict dress, &c. — as I have a touching bit of horse-y sentiment (!) connected therewith, which will do for Spg. Gazette. — I should think you ought to find painty bits — within walking distance — say — right or left ten miles?

Yrs. affecty.,

Dad.

Sunday.

Really, my dear Walter, I thought you did know better than to disturb my devotional frame of mind on this blessed Sabbath morn by forwarding me such a thoroughly worldly and evil-thought-producing thing as a wretched milliner's bill!!! — The wretch must wait — he gorged £5 not long before I left home. — The greediness of some men!!

The Pic. Gall. circular I return — as you may like to enquire about it — the doz. others, “cheap bacon” — ”patent teeth and everlasting gums,” &c., &c., &c., &c. I shall manure the grounds of Colyton with — — .

I think you might get some background material for coast scenes down here.

Yr. affec. Dad,

H. K. B.

69, Blenheim Crescent, Notting-Hill, Saturday.

My dear Doctor,

I send the Tenpounder, may it reach you in safety!

The Commander has returned. I sent you a paper containing the important news, which, however, may not have reached you, although I don't think it contained any remarks upon the “Hemperor's personal appearance,” &c., &c., &c.

Tom is in the bosom of the family for a few days. — His Pipe is tuned differently now to what it used to was, for he now declareth that St. John's is “a jolly school!” He seems to get on very well indeed, and has brought home what Dr. Lowe calls a “well-earned prize.”

He laments daily over the supposed loss of 4d invested in a letter to you — from school — as it was directed, he says, — 21, Rue Mussel wine — I express doubts of its having reached you — and he groans aloud over the Bull's eyes it would have bought! — —

I am (at present) on a Sporting Paper — supported by some high and mighty Turf Nobs, but, I fear, like everything I have to do with, now-a-days, it will collapse — for — some of the Proprietors of the Paper are also Shareholders, &c., &c., in the Graphotype Co., so they want to work the two together. — I hate the process — it takes quite four times as long as wood — and I cannot draw and express myself with a nasty little finiking brush, and the result when printed seems to alternate between something all as black as my hat — or as hazy and faint as a worn-out plate. — If on wood, I should like it well enough — as it is — it spoils 4 days a week — leaving little time for anything else. O! I'm a'weary, I'm a'weary! of this illustration business. — —

Tom is just off to the R.A., as it is not likely I shall go much before it's close. I will get him to write you a critical description of all the wonderful works in Turps, Varnish, and “Hile.”

Yr. affectionate Dad,

H. K. B.

Monday Morning, 25 m. 40 s. p. 11 a.m.

My Dear Walter,

There is a man playing “Home, sweet home” upon the key bugle — it is too much for me — my heart yearneth — I feel I must write just a line or two — especially as it is raining hard — and I don’t exactly know what to be at.

Splendid effects yesterday evening — sun-set, twilight, crescent moon — stormy clouds, — tide out — reflections — dark fishing-craft — very good — quite the thing for you.

There are no people here at present — decidedly nothing Belgravian — chiefly masculines — from the Saturday to the Monday sort — it striketh me — a few I think have strayed here from Southend — I saw this sort of thing [see page 29] on the Grand Promenade — which looks like it. — —

There was a great wind yesterday — Boreas had been taking concentrated essence of ginger — It fairly took me off my legs once as I was walking along the cliffs to Broadstairs, luckily for me it blew off the sea — and I was brought up short by some railings in this wise — [see page 22] otherwise I should (no doubt) have been carried across a 5 acre field of Cloveria Trifolia Browniensis. — I am glad to say I was also of service to humanity yesterday — I heard the shrill shrieks of a child and a woman’s cry for help behind me — I turned — and saw there was not a moment to lose, the wind had caught a poor child — ’s hat (and woman’s too) and bore it rapidly to the edge of the cliff — with my usual agility I bounded over the rails fencing the cliff — and saved — yes, saved the child — ’s — ’at! — another puff and it would have been in the deep, deep sea — the blue, the fresh, &c. — Stout mama thanked me politely, and turning to her husband (who, of course, had come up too late to be of any use — those husbands always do) — she remarked “That the vind had blown both her and her child’s ‘at hoff and if she’d know’d it — she wouldn’t have brought the young-un hout.”

I dare say humanity is amusing here when the place is full — there seems a good deal of “os” exercise — and basket-carriage driving on Sundays — which is good to behold — this gentleman [see page 25] was driving with supreme self-content — having one rein all snug and tight under his pony's tail — luckily the beast did not seem to have any kick in him — so perhaps he got safe back to Margate.

Yr. affec. Dad,

H. K. B.

29th Sept. 1868.

My Dear Doctor,

I have sent you a couple of canvasses — if you put little Clara's head on one of them, you will immortalize her and yourself too.

Also therewith you will find a Surplice, and if you will only "hold forth," next Sunday, in the Grande Place of Colyton — I will guarantee to say that the simplicity of yr. vestment and the flowing eloquence of yr. tongue will draw out — (as irresistibly as the Piper did the children) the congregations of the "High" Church and the Conventicles which will — one and all — rush forth for to see and to hear, and admiringly surround you! — If windy, you might take this for yr. text — "What went ye forth for to see? — " A reed shaken by the wind? &c., &c.

There must have been a splendid Sea on at Sea-ton, these last few days, — tons of sea, eh? As “I took my walk abroad” this morning — I saw the Serpentine in all its grandeur — and observed several vessels in distress — some clipper yachts on their beam ends — the waves were prodigious — great rollers — two especially — one a six horse fellow — t’other a steamer — crunching and grinding — levelling and sweeping all before them!

Have you seen the Doge of Colyton yet? or any of the Dog-es?

By all means cultivate the acquaintance of the Doge’s kinswoman. Miss P — — (pray give my love to her) — fac-similed on the stage or in a novel, she would be a “tremendous hit.”

I hope you are not belying the good character I have given of you to the boys — and are doing Elephant, Tiger, and Rhinoceros to their perfect satisfaction — though, considering yr. predecessor — it will test your utmost powers, not to be a wretched failure, possibly — much the same sort of thing — as your attempting to sing a comic song immediately after the Great Vance!!! Good Night,

Yr. affectionate Dad,

H. K. B.

The following notes have been selected from the unpublished correspondence of “Phiz” with Charles Dickens: —

My Dear Dickens,

I have just got one boot on, intending to come round to you, but you have done me out of a capital excuse to myself for idling away this fine morning. — I quite forgot to answer your note, and Mr. Macrone’s book has not been very vividly present to my memory for some time past. I think by the beginning of next (week) or the middle (certain) I shall have done the plates, but in the scraps of copy that I have I can see but one good subject, so if you know of another pray send it me. I should like “Malcolm” again, if you can spare him.

Believe me,

Yours very truly,

Hablot K. Browne.

Charles Dickens, Esq.

Sunday, Sept.

My Dear Dickens,

Can you conveniently send me the subject or subjects for next week by Thursday or Friday? as I wish, if practicable, to start for Brussels by the Sunday's boat — a word in reply will oblige,

Yours truly,

Hablot K. Browne.

Charles Dickens, Esq.

P.S. — Upon second thoughts I send you the enclosed epistle — (if you read it, you will find out why) — the writer thereof is “Harry Lorrequer,” alias “Charles O'Malley” — to whose house I am going.

H. K. B.

P.S. Second — A fortnight's furlough would suit me better than a week, if it could be managed, as I should like to return by Holland.

My Dear Dickens,

I am sorry I cannot have a touch at battledore with you to-day, being already booked for this evening — but I will give you a call to-morrow after church, and take my chance of finding you at home.

Yours very sincerely,

Hablot K. Browne.

Charles Dickens, Esq.

33, Howland Street.

My Dear Dickens,

I shall be most happy to remember not to forget the 10th April, and, let me express a disinterested wish, that having completed and established one “Shop” in an “extensive line of business,” you will go on increasing and multiplying such like establishments in number and prosperity till you become a Dick Whittington of a merchant, with pockets distended to most Brobdignag dimensions.

Believe me,

Yours very truly,

Hablot K. Browne.

Charles Dickens, Esq.

I return you the Riots with many thanks.

Sunday Morning.

My Dear Dickens,

Will you give me some notion of the sort of design you wish for the frontispiece to second vol. of Clock?[K] Cattermole being put hors de combat — Chapman with a careworn face (if you can picture that) brings me the block at the eleventh hour, and requires it finished by Wednesday. Now as I have two others to complete in the meantime — something nice and light would be best adapted to my palette, and prevent an excess of perspiration in the relays of wood-cutters. You shall have the others to criticise on Tuesday.

Yours very truly,

Hablot K. Browne.

Charles Dickens, Esq.

A List of the Principal Works Illustrated by "Phiz."

To enumerate all the works illustrated by "Phiz" would be a next to impossible task, for "their name is legion." No artist was so popular or so prolific as a book-illustrator, with the exception, perhaps, of George Cruikshank. It may fairly be questioned whether the works of Charles Dickens, with which the name of "Phiz" is most intimately associated in our minds, would have achieved such notoriety without the aid of the etching needle so ably wielded. Mr. John Hollingshead, in his essay on Dickens, says: —

"The greater the value of a book as a literary production, the more will the circle of its influence usually be narrowed. The very shape, aspect, and garments of the ideal creatures who move through its pages, even when drawn by the pen of the first master of fiction in the land, will be faint and confused to the blunter perception of the general reader, unless aided by the attendant pencil of the illustrative artist. For the sharp, clear images of Mr. Pickwick, with the spectacles, gaiters, and low crowned hat — of Sam Weller, with the striped waistcoat and the artful leer — of Mr. Winkle, with the sporting costume and the foolish expression — more persons are indebted to the caricaturist, than to the faultless descriptive passages of the great creative mind that called the amusing puppets into existence.”

It was not the fame of Dickens only that was enhanced by “Phiz,” for the numerous illustrations in the works of Charles Lever, Harrison Ainsworth, the brothers Mayhew, and a host of minor novelists were executed by his unwearied hand. It was Dickens, however, who introduced him to public notice, in a pamphlet, now very scarce, entitled Sunday under Three Heads, embellished with four delicately executed engravings drawn by “H. K. B.”

It was his succession to Seymour as the illustrator of the Pickwick Papers, that really excited public interest in the youthful artist, who created, pictorially, the second hero in the work, the inimitable Samuel Weller. Those who are familiar with the original edition of the Pickwick Papers will remember with some amusement, the artist’s introduction of the indefatigable “Boots,” as represented in the yard of the “White Hart” Inn, Borough. The identical Inn exists at the present day. “Mr. Pickwick in the Pound” is another amusing plate, where the laughing, jeering crowd of spectators crowned by a jubilant and juvenile chimney sweeper, the braying of a jackass in the ears of the astonished hero, who sits somewhat uncomfortably in a wheelbarrow, are incidents so cleverly depicted as to excite unqualified admiration. “Mr. Pickwick Slides” is another truly artistic production. The delicate execution of the extreme distance where is seen a manor house of the olden time nestling amongst the trees, and a farmyard hard by, leaves nothing to be desired. Mr. Sala somewhat harshly criticises the illustrations in this work, which, he says, “were exceedingly humorous, but vilely drawn. The amazing success of his author seems, however, to have spurred the artist to sedulous study, and to have conduced in a remarkable degree towards the development of his faculties. A surprising improvement was visible in the frontispieces to the completed volumes[L] of Pickwick.” Undoubtedly faults exist, but to characterize the illustrations as “vile,” seems too severe a term, for after all, the exaggerated types of face, form, and feature, do but harmonize with the somewhat exaggerated descriptions of them by the author. This defect, if such it can be called, was remedied considerably in his later productions.

In 1837, "Phiz" accompanied Dickens into Yorkshire, there to gather material for Nicholas Nickleby, a work which exposes the tyranny practised by some schoolmasters on their helpless pupils. In this book, published in 1839, is presented to us the despicable "Squeers," which type of brute in human form was so successfully realized by both Author and Artist, that the indignation of innumerable Yorkshire pedagogues was raised to threats of legal proceedings, for traducing their characters, one of them actually stating that "he remembered being waited on last January twelvemonth by two gentlemen, one of whom held him in conversation while the other took his likeness." The most familiar representation of "Squeers" is seen in the second plate, where he stands sharpening his pen, and is timorously approached by the stout father of two wizen-faced boys who are about to become his pupils. The face of the schoolmaster, in which are combined hypocrisy and cruelty, and the expression of sympathy for the new comers exhibited by the boy on the trunk, are worthy of the closest inspection. The effect of the school treatment at Dotheboy's Hall is visible in the illustration where "The Internal Economy" is depicted. Here we see the starveling lads during and after the "internal" application of superabundant doses of brimstone and treacle, administered by Squeers' worthy partner. The eighth plate happily depicts the wild excitement of the pupils when "Nicholas astonishes Mr. Squeers and family" by making a furious attack on the former with the cane; as well as "The breaking-up at Dotheboy's Hall," where the boys revenge themselves on their former tormentors. There are two more etchings in this volume especially remarkable as artistic productions, viz., "Mr. and Mrs. Mantalini in Ralph Nickleby's Office," where the expression of an intent listener on the face of Ralph, and of horror on that of Mantalini, is capitally rendered; and the plate entitled "The Recognition," which shows poor Smike in the act of rising from a couch of sickness as he recognizes "Broker," who had conveyed him as a child to school.

Master Humphrey's Clock, written in 1840-1, includes the stories of the Old Curiosity Shop and Barnaby Rudge which have been happily termed "two unequalled twin fictions upon one stem." The illustrations were drawn on wood by H. K. Browne and George Cattermole, and the former created, pictorially, Little Nell, Mrs. Jarley, Quilp, Dick Swiveller, the Marchioness, Sally Brass, and her brother Sampson. "Phiz" revelled in wild fun in the vignettes relating to the devilries of Mr. Daniel Quilp and the humours of Codlin and Short, and of Mrs. Jarley's waxwork show. His "Marchioness" was a distinct comic creation; but in the weird waterscape, showing the corpse of Quilp washed ashore, he sketched a vista of riparian scenery which, in its desolate breadth and loneliness, has not since, perhaps, been equalled, save in the amazing suggestive Thames etchings of Mr. James Whistler. To be sure, Hablot Browne was stimulated to excellence during the continuance of the Old Curiosity Shop by the friendly rivalry of the famous water-colour painter, George Cattermole, who drew the charming vignettes of the quaint old cottages and school-house and church of the village where "Little Nell" died. In Barnaby Rudge, however, Hablot Browne had things graphic his own way, and again towards the close he manifested genuine tragic power. His "Barnaby with the Raven" is lovely in its picturesque grace.[M] When the first cheap series of this work was published, plates by H. K. Browne were issued, which are now so scarce, that they are often catalogued at eight or ten times their original price.

Two years after the visit of Dickens to America in 1842, Martin Chuzzlewit was published, the illustrations to which excel in vigour all the previous efforts of "Phiz." Here we are brought face to face, in a pictorial sense, with the hypocrite, Mr. Pecksniff, the abstemious Mrs. Gamp and her bosom friend, Betsy Prig, simple Tom Pinch and his charming sister, Ruth. The frontispiece is a most ambitious work, but none the less successful, for "Phiz" has represented, in the space of a few square inches, all the leading events, humorous and pathetic, described in the novel. In the illustration where Mark Tapley is seen starting from his native village for London, "Phiz" exhibits his sense of the picturesque in the old gables and dormers of the cottages which form the background. The plate, "Mr. Pecksniff on his Mission," is full of interest, and gives us an insight into the character of Kingsgate Street, Holborn, at that time. The female neighbours of Mrs. Gamp, the midwife, flock round Pecksniff, commiserating with him on his supposed domestic cares, and advising him to “knock at the winder, Sir; knock at the winder. Lord bless you, don’t lose no more time than you can help — knock at the winder!”

But the etching in Chuzzlewit which most strikes the reader as a ludicrous conception, is that where “Mrs. Gamp propoges a toast.” Here he has admirably illustrated the text, wherein is described, with other details of a droll character, how some rusty gowns and other articles of that lady’s wardrobe depended from the bed-posts; and “these had so adapted themselves by long usage to her figure, that more than one impatient husband, coming in precipitately, at about the time of twilight, had been for an instant stricken dumb by the supposed discovery that Mrs. Gamp had hanged herself.” In the background of the picture are represented these indispensable articles of dress, while at the table sit, in friendly chat, Mrs. Gamp and Betsy.

“Betsy,” said Mrs. Gamp, filling her own glass and passing the tea-pot, “I will now propoge a toast. My frequent pardner, Betsy Prig!”

“Which, altering the name to Sairah Gamp; I drink,” said Mrs. Prig, “with love and tenderness.”

In 1846, Dombey and Son commenced, with forty illustrations by “Phiz.” The frontispiece is similar in design to that of Chuzzlewit, introducing the principal characters and events in the novel. The austere and pompous (not to say selfish) Mr. Dombey, whom “Phiz” had great difficulty in realizing to the author’s satisfaction,[N] is introduced in many of the plates, although the artist has somewhat failed in preserving the same type of face throughout. He has succeeded better with the genial Captain Cuttle. Little Paul, as he sits in his diminutive arm-chair, contrasts most favourably in his childish innocence, with the grim Mrs. Pipchin, whose Ogress-like character is strongly marked. The scene in which Mr. Dombey introduces his daughter Florence to Mrs. Skewton, is one of the most successful in the book, and contains the best type of Dombey. Here also, the face of Florence is truly pretty, and the artist has well portrayed the handsome but vindictive Edith denouncing Carker for his treachery. A very effective etching entitled, “On the Dark Road,” represents the flight of the enraged and disappointed libertine. The horses are being urged on their mad career by the whip and spurs of a postilion, under the dark sky with a glimmer of light in the horizon caused by the rising sun. The artist at this time essayed a process of working on plates over which a half-tint had been previously laid by means of a ruling-machine, and in which the “high-lights” were afterwards “stopped out,” and the “whites” “burnished out.” He frequently availed himself of these ready means of producing effect. Full-length portraits of the principal characters in Dombey, which were issued as additional plates by “Phiz,” are now very scarce.

David Copperfield (1850), with forty illustrations, was the next venture, but was not so much an artistic as a literary success. A favourite character in it of course, is Micawber, a kindly caricature of the Author’s father, the realization of whom, by Browne, obtained the hearty approval of Dickens.

The most characteristic and, perhaps, most successful work of “Phiz” is to be seen in the illustrations to Bleak House. A view of the “House” itself forms the subject of the frontispiece. “The Ghost’s Walk,” the “Drawing-room at Chesney Wold,” “Tom All-alone’s,” and the gateway leading to the burial ground where Lady Dedlock has fallen lifeless, are instances where the artist has obtained some fine effects by the “ruled-plate” process. A writer in The Daily Telegraph, of July 11th, 1882, speaks somewhat disparagingly of these illustrations, but The Academy of a few days later, in the following remarks, thus demurs to his criticism: —

“In the Bleak House illustrations hardly anything is wrong; there is no shortcoming. Not only is the comic side, the even fussily comic, such as ‘the young man of the name of Guppy,’ understood and rendered well, but the dignified beauty of old country-house architecture, or the architecture of the chambers of our inns-of-court is conveyed in brief touches; and there is apparent everywhere that element of terrible suggestiveness which made not only the art of Hablot Browne, but the art of Charles Dickens himself, in this story of Bleak House, recall the imaginative purpose of the art of Méryon. What can be more impressive in connection with the story — nay, even independently of the story — than the illustration of Mr. Tulkinghorn’s chambers in gloom; than the illustration of the staircase at Dedlock’s own house, with the placard of the reward for the discovery of the murderer; than that of Tom All Alone’s; the dark, foul darkness of the burial ground shown under scanty lamplight, and the special spot where lay the man who ‘wos very good to me — he wos!’? And then again, ‘the Ghost’s Walk,’ and once more the burial ground, with the woman’s body — Lady Dedlock’s — now close against its gate. Of course it would be possible to find fault with these things, but they have nothing of the vice of tameness — they deliver their message effectually. It is not their business to be faultless; it is their business to impress.”

A very successful rendering of character in Bleak House is that of Harold Skimpole, whose prototype was Leigh Hunt, an intimate friend of the Novelist, who, by his unintentional disregard for the feelings of Hunt in caricaturing his peculiarities, nearly severed that friendship. Again, there is intense humour in the illustration facetiously styled, "In re Guppy, extraordinary proceeding." The love-sick Guppy is seen in a kneeling posture, while declaring to Miss Summerson the burning passion that consumes him. The expression on the face of the young lady shows that she is more amused than flattered by his preference.

In Little Dorrit (1855-7) the experience gained by both Author and Artist during their tour of the London prisons, stood them in good stead, for here the Marshalsea is fully described, the type of a debtor's jail. The first illustration represents the interior of a French prison, in which are incarcerated Monsieur Rigaud and Signor John Baptist. The effect of deep gloom in the cell is produced by the "ruled-plate" method, and is quite Rembrandt-like. In contrast with this, the illustration of "The Ferry," is a delightful country aspect, with trees and winding river; and another plate entitled "Floating away," an evening scene, the moon rising behind the trees, is quite romantic. The old house in the last picture but one — "Damocles," — again shows Browne's appreciation of the picturesque architecture of bygone times, in the effect of light from the setting sun as it falls upon the house front, throwing into relief the quaint old carvings of door and window.

The last work illustrated by "Phiz" for Dickens was The Tale of Two Cities (1859), containing sixteen etchings full of vigour, as the character of the story justifies.

For some reason, at this time, a rupture was caused between author and artist, [O] which resulted in the engagement of Mr. Marcus Stone and Mr. Luke Fildes as illustrators of Our Mutual Friend and Edwin Drood. These accomplished painters avoided the old system of caricature, the old, forced humour; but it is certain that their designs are less intimately associated with the persons in the stories they illustrated than those of "Phiz" with the earlier and more popular works of Dickens.

Having devoted the larger portion of the space at our disposal to a description of the most famous productions of Browne's pencil, which are prominent in the original editions of the Novels of Charles Dickens, we can but briefly enumerate the plates he etched for Lever, Ainsworth, and others.

In Charles Lever's Harry Lorrequer (1839) and Charles O'Malley (1841), the uproarious mirth and jollity of Irish military life is well portrayed by the needle of the artist. "The last night in Trinity" in the latter work, is an example of this, wherein is seen the worthy Doctor perched on a table, surrounded by a batch of Irish dragoons, and being elevated by an explosion of combustibles. The horses in the illustrations are admirably drawn.

In Jack Hinton (1842) the artist shows remarkable force in depicting the death of Shaun, and has well realized the humour of "Corney's Combat with the Cossack."

Tom Burke of Ours (1844) contains forty-four illustrations by "Phiz," many of which represent the scenes connected with the battles of Austerlitz, &c., during the reign of the great Napoleon. Most especially noticeable is the scene in a court of justice, with "Darby in the Chair;" the face of that hero with an expression apparently abashed, but really full of roguishness, as he gazes at the counsel, is one of the most successful of Browne's efforts.

The O'Donoghue (1845), has twenty-six illustrations, most of which are well conceived. The falling body of a man in the frontispiece is a remarkable drawing. The girlish figure of Kate O'Donoghue, as she bends over the form of her heart-broken brother Herbert, is well depicted.

St. Patrick's Eve (1845), with four etchings and several woodcuts. The most remarkable of the former is "The Cholera Hut."

The Knight of Gwynne (1847), with forty illustrations.

Roland Cashel (1850), with forty illustrations.

The Daltons (1852), with forty-eight illustrations.

The Dodd Family Abroad (1854), with forty illustrations. The shrewd simplicity of Kenny Dodd is well delineated.

The Martins of Cro' Martin (1856), with forty illustrations.

Davenport Dunn (1859), with forty-four illustrations.

One of Them (1861), with thirty illustrations.

Barrington (1863), with twenty-six illustrations.

Luttrell of Arran (1865), with thirty-two illustrations.

The following works of W. Harrison Ainsworth contain etchings and woodcuts by "Phiz:" —

Revelations of London, published about 1845, but never completed, has an illustration which represents a tumble-down house in Vauxhall Road, which is almost Rembrandt-like in its power. The artist was about thirty years of age when he executed this.

Old St. Paul's (1847), contains only two plates by "Phiz," but The Spendthrift (1857), Mervyn Clitheroe, and Crichton were wholly illustrated by him.

Some Miscellaneous Works Illustrated by "Phiz."

A Paper: of Tobacco, &c., by Joseph Fume (1839). With six plates by "Phiz." Fiddle Faddle's Sentimental Tour, in search of the Amusing, Picturesque, and Agreeable (1845). The Union Magazine. Vol. I (1846). Containing three plates by "Phiz." The Illuminated Magazine. Conducted by Douglas Jerrold (1843-5), with woodcut illustrations by Leech, "Phiz" (H. K. Browne), and others. Fanny, the little Milliner, or the Rich and the Poor (1846), illustrated by "Phiz" and Onwhyn. Wits and Beaux of Society. Sketches of Cantabs, by John Smith (of Smith Hall), Gent. (1850). The Cambridge Freshman. With woodcut illustrations. Paved with Gold, or Romance and Reality of the London Streets, by Augustus Mayhew (1858). A Medical, Moral, and Christian Dissection of Teetotalism by Democritus (1846). New Sporting Magazine (1839). The Pottleton Legacy, by Albert Smith. Christmas Day, and how it was spent by four persons in the house of Fograss, Fograss, Mowton, and Snorton, bankers, by C. Le Ros (1854). Home Pictures (Durtin & Co., 1856). A series of seven charming and characteristic plates. Dame Perkins and her Grey Mare, or the Mount for Market, by L. Meadows (1866). With coloured illustrations. H. B.'s Schoolboy Days. THE CITY OF EDWIN DROOD

By Burton Egbert Stevenson

The little old town of Rochester, snuggled up into the curving arm of the Medway on the Kentish border, must always be the chief place of pilgrimage for the Dickensian. It fairly reeks of Dickens; it was the scene of his first story and his last, and of many others in between. Hither Mr. Pickwick and his three companions journeyed on their first historic expedition out of London. They stopped at the Bull Hotel, still standing, practically unaltered, where their rooms may yet be seen — and even slept in! It was here that Mr. Alfred Jingle and Mr. Tracy Tupman attended a ball — in a room still used for balls — and had an altercation with Dr. Slammer of the Ninety-seventh, which involved the bewildered Mr. Winkle in a duel next day. It was in this same Bull Hotel, masquerading under the name of the Blue Boar, that Pip and Mrs. Gargery and Uncle Pumblechook and the Hubbies and Mr. Wopsle celebrated a windfall of twenty-five guineas — the price of Pip's freedom — by a great dinner, at which, rather late in the evening, Mr. Wopsle favoured with Collins's Ode, and threw his blood-stained sword in thunder down with such effect that the commercials underneath sent a waiter up to protest.

It might be added that the Bull lives largely on its Pickwickian reputation. At either side of the wide entrance gateway is a board bearing Mr. Jingle's words, "Good house. Nice beds"; the words appear also on the bill of fare and the hotel stationery; and if one wishes to explore the place, a fee of sixpence must first be paid. One other title to fame has the Bull, and this, too, is proudly proclaimed by a board above the entrance, which informs the visitor that "Queen Victoria Stayed at This Hotel." Indeed, the inn is known officially as "The Bull and Royal Victoria Hotel," the latter part of the title having been added in 1836, when the Queen, then Princess Victoria, travelling to London with her mother, the Duchess of Kent, was overtaken by a terrific storm and forced to take refuge at the inn over night. Mr. Jingle's eulogium was pronounced by a man who had never stayed in the house, and Princess Victoria was forced to put up there against her will; so that the two principal items of its advertisement will not bear a critical examination. Nevertheless, it is a good house, with pleasant rooms and a beautiful stairway and a snug bar and a bright, clean coffee room, where some of the old furniture from Gad's Hill Place has been installed, and a great yard such as one sees nowhere but in these old coaching taverns; and the pilgrim to Rochester will do well to stop there.

ROCHESTER CATHEDRAL. THE SPIRAL STAIRCASE IS IN THE CORNER TOWER MARKED WITH A CROSS

One must stop some days, if one wishes to exhaust the Dickens interest of the town and neighbourhood, for Dickens's tales are filled with references to Rochester under various disguises. Naturally enough, for he spent six impressionable years of childhood in the adjoining town of Chatham, and, nearly forty years later, realised a childhood dream by buying Gad's Hill Place, three miles out on the Gravesend road, where he lived until his death.

But this paper is concerned only with Rochester's connection with The Mystery of Edwin Drood. To students of that unfinished tale — a mystery in a double sense — Rochester is exceedingly interesting, for, under the thin disguise of "Cloisterham," it is used as the scene of its principal events with remarkable exactness of detail. The action centres about the old cathedral, itself one of the most picturesque in England, and it has always been the hope of the present writer that a careful examination of the ground might give some clue to the solution of the story which Dickens had in mind. It was his good fortune to have been able to make that examination last summer, and his further good fortune to have had as companion and guide Mr. Edwin Harris, perhaps the most famous Dickensian now living at Rochester, and the author of a number of monographs dealing with Dickens's connection with the town. If any results were to be obtained at all by a careful survey of the ground, they would have been obtained in such company; but it may as well be said at once that such results as were obtained were wholly negative. In a word, they showed that certain things could not have happened, but they pointed to no certain solution of the mystery.

The protagonist of Edwin Drood, it will be remembered, is John Jasper, choir-master of Cloisterham cathedral, and uncle of the fated Edwin. He is painted as a dark and sinister individual, addicted to opium and subject to fits — rather a stage villain, all in all,

Jasper's Gatehouse "The old gate still stands, a solid and handsome four-square piece of masonry. Above it is the little one-story-and-attic frame extension where Jasper dwelt."

scarcely convincing, and by no means so fearful as Dickens tried to make him. He lived in rooms over the old gate which shut the cathedral close from the High Street of the town. "One might fancy that the tide of life was stemmed by Mr. Jasper's own Gatehouse. The murmur of the tide is heard beyond, but no wave passes the archway, over which his lamp burns red behind the curtain, as if the building were a light-house."

This old gate still stands, a solid and handsome four-square piece of masonry, duly marked as "Jasper's Gatehouse" by a bronze plate put up by the Dickens Fellowship. Above it is the little one-story-and-attic frame extension where Jasper dwelt. It has been remodeled inside, so that the rooms no longer correspond with Dickens's description of them — perhaps they never did — but so far as the exterior goes, it has not changed since the day Dickens wrote of it. The march of improvement, however, has swept back the houses from one side and cut a street through, so that one may now enter the close without going through the gate at all. In Dickens's day, the houses hugged it closely on both sides, and one had only to close and bar the postern gate, which still hangs on its ancient hinges, to shut off ingress effectually.

Just within the gate, on the left as one enters, is the door where Mr. Datchery was wont to sit, his white hair about his ears, to watch Jasper's comings and goings. This was the house of Mr. Tope, the verger, and one may enter it now, for a sign above the door proclaims it, in language somewhat too archaic, to be "Ye Olde Gate House Tea Shoppe." The room beyond is as quaint as could well be imagined, with its low, beamed ceiling, its uneven floor, and quite authentic air of antiquity. But if one is looking for lunch, a better one may be had at the frankly modern shop on the other side of the High Street.

A hundred paces or so beyond the gate is the old graveyard adjoining the cathedral, shut off from the street by a high iron fence. It was through this fence that "Stony" Durdles, weaving his devious way homeward with Deputy at his heels, was wont to gaze admiringly at his creations in the tombstone line — "surrounded by his works, like a popular author." "Your own brother-in-law," as Durdles remarked one night to Jasper, "introducing a sarcophagus within the railing, white and cold in the moonlight. 'Mrs. Sapsea!' introducing the monument of that devoted wife. 'Late Incumbent;' introducing the Reverend Gentleman's broken column. 'Departed Assessed Taxes;' introducing a vase and towel, standing on what might represent the cake of soap. 'Former Pastrycook and Muffin-maker, much respected;' introducing gravestone. 'All safe and sound here, sir, and all Durdles's work. Of the common folk, that is merely bundled up in turf and brambles, the less said the better. A poor lot, soon forgot.'"

It is naturally for the Sapsea monument that one looks. As described in the book, it must have been a sort of burial vault which one could enter, for Durdles asks Sapsea for the key, in order that he may be sure that it is shipshape inside as well as out. Many hints in the story point to the likelihood that this monument was to play a most important part; most commentators believe that it was hither Jasper dragged his nephew's body and buried it in a bed of quicklime; some believe that Edwin died there, or was already dead; others think that Durdles, on his trip of inspection, stumbled upon the still-living body, snatched it forth, and brought it back to life, to confront the would-be murderer at the end of the story. Whatever purpose it was to serve, it need only be noted here that no monument even remotely resembling that assigned to Mrs. Sapsea exists in the churchyard, or, apparently, ever has existed there. It seems to have been wholly a creature of Dickens's fancy — which, of course, only makes it the more important,

THE CRYPT

“Since then, the crypt has been swept and whitewashed, and the air of mystery quite banished” since he would scarcely have been at so much pains to imagine it in detail unless he had a very definite use for it.

Just beyond the graveyard is the west front of the cathedral, with its beautiful round-headed doorway — one of the finest Norman doorways to be seen anywhere. To gaze through it into the dim and picturesque interior is, indeed, as Mr. Grewgious declared, “like looking down the throat of Old Time”; but it is not the purpose here to deal with the architecture of this “venerable pile,” except as it concerns Edwin Drood. From this point of view, the crypt is easily first in interest, for it was in the crypt that Durdles was constantly nosing about, turning up an “old un” now and then, or creeping into one of its dark corners to recover from the effects of a debauch; it was the crypt which Jasper carefully explored, with Durdles as guide, one moonlight night — an expedition about which Dickens sought to throw such an air of mystery and which he called “unaccountable” so often that every one agrees it had some close connection with the plot, the most obvious explanation being that Jasper was seeking a suitable place in which to make away with his nephew and dispose of his body, and had about decided that the crypt would do.

Forty years ago, the crypt was a dark and gloomy place, half-filled with dirt and rubbish — stone fragments, old tombstones, and debris of every sort, the accumulation of centuries. The glass was broken from the narrow windows, which were yet wide enough for a small boy to squeeze through, and so the boys of the neighbourhood used the place as a kind of gang headquarters. There are many men in Rochester, now verging into the sixties, who were more familiar with it at that time than they have ever been since, and who remember distinctly its damp and earthy smell, its darkness and general air of neglect and decay. It was in this condition that it was familiar to Dickens, and it must have seemed to him a very fitting place for the commission of such a crime as the murder of Edwin Drood. Here, too, a body could have been concealed, or placed in a bed of quicklime, with very little danger of discovery except by Durdles, and every one seems to be agreed that it was by Durdles the discovery was to be made.

Since then, the crypt has been swept and whitewashed, the glass restored to the windows, and the air of mystery quite banished. Throngs of visitors, at sixpence a head, troop through it daily, under the guidance of a verger, and it would now be quite impossible to conceal anything there, as a glance at the accompanying photograph will show. So it takes some effort of the imagination to reconstruct the place as it appeared on the night of the “unaccountable expedition.”

Dickens has described its progress with great detail, and one can follow it step by step. Jasper calls for Durdles at the hole in the city wall in which he lives, just back of the Travellers’ Twopenny, and together they cross the Monks’ Vineyard and come to Minor Canon Corner, and pause behind a “piece of old dwarf wall, breast high, the only remaining boundary of what was once a garden, but is now the thoroughfare,” and which has long since been swept away. Then they walk on toward the cathedral along a narrow passage past the ruined cloisters which still exists, and enter the crypt by a small side door of which Durdles has the key. The door and the “rugged steps” which they descend are, of course, easily identified.

They walk up and down the crypt for some time, then mount the flight of steps leading ‘into the nave of the cathedral, and pause while Durdles unlocks the heavy door at the top, “with the key he has already used.” It is perhaps worth remarking that this door does not need a key to be opened from the inside. Indeed, a key cannot be used, as the bolt of the lock is controlled by a catch. The catch is a trick catch, as the present writer found, after he had been shut into the crypt by the verger, spent an interesting half hour there, and then tried to get out again, for it was some time before he mastered the trick and regained his liberty. The lock is very old, and the key which is needed to work it from the outside is a heavy iron one — perhaps the very one which Durdles is supposed to have carried and which Jasper examined so minutely.

Another short flight of steps leads to the choir, which is a few feet higher than the nave, and here there is another gate, an iron one in the beautiful old choir-screen, which Durdles also unlocks. Once in the choir, they cross it diagonally to the far corner, pass through the door leading to the corner tower, and “go up the winding staircase, turning and turning, and lowering their heads to avoid the stairs above, or the rough stone pivot around which they twist. Twice or thrice,” Dickens adds, “they emerge into low-arched galleries, whence they can look down into the moonlit nave.” This is a curious mistake for Dickens, who had presumably been up this staircase many times, to make, for there is no opening from the stairway into the triforium, nor any through which one can look down into the nave.

It has been the theory of many people that Jasper killed his nephew by pushing him from the top of this tower on the night of the great storm, after having inveigled him up there in a semi-intoxicated condition, and that he then descended and bundled the body into the crypt. A visit to the tower disproves this theory, because there is no way in which this could be done. There is no way to get out to the top of it, for it is covered by a solid four-square roof, and the single narrow door opens upon the gutter of the church-roof, which is guarded by a parapet some three or four feet high. Over the parapet at this point a body might, indeed, be thrown, and would fall a sheer hundred feet or more to the pavement below. If the body was thrown over at all, it must have been just here, for at every other point the gutters overlook the lower roofs of the aisles or of similar projections built against the main body of the church. There can be little doubt that it was from this point Jasper and Durdles looked down on Cloisterham, “fair to see in the moonlight.”

They seem to have descended without going any farther; but this is really only the beginning of a most interesting journey. Passing along this gutter, one enters a little door leading into the great central tower of the church. There is a platform here, from which a long steep ladder leads to a trapdoor opening on the platform above the bells. On either side stretches a dim space, circumscribed above by the heavy timbers of the roof, and below by the rolling masses of the stone vaulting of the transepts. A narrow walk of planks spans this vaulting, and one creeps forward cautiously above the billows of stone, bending low under the great cross-timbers of the roof, and peering down into abysses masked in blackness.

MINOR CANON ROW

“A wonderfully quaint row of brick tenements, with odd little porches over the doors, like sounding-boards over old pulpits”

To the expert in architecture, this vaulting in reverse must be most interesting; to the student of Edwin Drood the thought occurs that this dark and eyrie place is more suggestive of tragedy than the crypt could ever have been, and one wonders if it was not in one of these black pits, whose depths are quite secure from any casual observation, and where even Durdles never came, that Edwin Drood's body was to be concealed, after he had been strangled with the long neckcloth. Dickens was, of course, familiar with it, and the picture which appeared on the cover of the original issue of the story, drawn from directions given by Dickens himself, might be held to give some basis for the theory. For, at the right of the cover, is shown a spiral stair up which three men, obviously Tartar, Grewgious and Crisparkle, are hastening. It is undoubtedly the tower stair which is depicted, and the present writer has always believed that the three men were hastening in pursuit of the fleeing Jasper, who was to be captured by the agile Tartar after a fierce chase over the cathedral roof; but the cause of their haste may really be the chance discovery of the body somewhere in the dim recesses overhead. Or perhaps the conscience-stricken Jasper, drawn back to the body of his victim, as murderers so often are in fiction, and sometimes even in real life, may be all unconsciously leading them to it.

One point more. Andrew Lang hazarded the guess that Jasper might have killed his nephew by drugging him and then pushing him down the winding staircase of the tower. Any one who has been up that staircase will realise the absurdity of this, for it is so narrow and turns so sharply that no one could possibly fall down it more than a few steps.

The first turning beyond the cathedral, as one leaves it by the west door, is Minor Canon Corner, leading to Minor Canon Row, “a wonderfully quaint row of brick tenements, with odd little porches over the doors, like soundingboards over old pulpits.” In one of them — the second one from the far end, so Mr. Harris says — the athletic Crisparkle lived with his mother, and took the ill-fated Neville Landless to stay as a pupil. This row of houses is quite unchanged, as may be seen from the accompanying photograph, and is still, no doubt, inhabited by the minor canons of the cathedral.

A hundred yards farther on is a public park known as The Vines, which was once the vineyard belonging to the Priory of Saint Andrew, connected with the cathedral. That the good monks were fond of wine the size of the vineyard shows. It is mentioned many times in Edwin Drood. Three days before his death, Dickens, who was finding the writing of the story unexpectedly difficult, walked over from Gad’s Hill, and spent a long time in The Vines, leaning against the fence, apparently so deep in thought that he did not notice, as he certainly did not heed, the salutations of chance passers-by. That he was pondering his story cannot be doubted, for the Monks’ Vineyard figures in the pages written a few hours before his death.

EASTGATE HOUSE

“It was here that Miss Twinkleton kept her Select Seminary for Young Ladies”

If one leaves The Vines by the gate in front of Restoration House and turns to the left along Crow Lane, one comes in a few minutes to the site of the “Travellers’ Twopenny,” as it is known in Edwin Drood. Its real name was “The White Duck,” and Dickens certainly does not exaggerate its shady character, for its memory still survives in Rochester as a public house so disreputable that any girl seen coming out of it, or out of the alley leading to the rear entrance, lost her good name at once and forever. It was torn down many years ago.

The alley which runs back past the place leads to the fragment of the ancient city wall, in which Stony Durdles had his abode. The yard in which his monuments were cut and polished was in front of it, and it will be remembered that, on the night Jasper paid the place a visit, he nearly stepped into a heap of quicklime.

“‘Ware that there mound by the yardgate, Mister Jarsper,’ says Durdles.

“‘I see it. What is it?’

“‘Lime.’

“Mr. Jasper stops, and waits for him to come up, for he lags behind.

“‘What you call quicklime?’

“‘Ay!’ says Durdles; ‘quick enough to eat your boots. With a little handy stirring, quick enough to eat your bones.’“

That is all that is said about the quicklime, but the suggestion is obvious. The one thing which has puzzled the commentators is to explain how Jasper managed to get enough of the stuff to bury a body in inside the Sapsea vault, or into the crypt. Mr. Lang, or perhaps it is Mr. Proctor, suggests that Jasper spent a strenuous night wheeling it there in a barrow, and points out the emphasis which Dickens lays upon the fact that the close is absolutely silent and deserted after nightfall, so that Jasper would stand in small danger of discovery. But to get to the close, he would have had to come out past the Travellers’ Twopenny, the one place in Cloisterham where stragglers were almost certain to be encountered at any hour of the night. It is possible that Dickens may have had at the back of his mind when he began to tale some such development, but he must have abandoned it when he came to consider it more carefully.

Returning to Crow Lane and proceeding on in the direction of the High Street, one presently finds one’s self opposite a great, rambling, three-storied brick building, with many bays and dormers. It is known as the Eastgate House, and is now a museum owned by the town; but it is also both the Nuns’ House of Edwin Drood and the Westgate House of the Pickwick Papers. It was here that Miss Twinkleton kept her Select Seminary for Young Ladies; it was here that Rosa Bud and Helena Landless went to school, and it was in the garden attached that Jasper made his violent and threatening declaration of love. It is a most interesting pile, dating from 1591; originally the mansion of a great gentleman, Sir Peter Bucke, it fell from that high estate, and for many years was really used as a school for girls. It is 'as a girls' school that it figures also in Pickwick, for it was here, one dark night, that Sam Weller boosted his portly employer over the wall, in the effort to prevent an elopement — an adventure which ended in Mr. Pickwick's discomfiture and confusion.

Just across the street is the three-storied house — each story overhanging the one below — where dwelt Mr. Sapsea, auctioneer and mayor of Cloisterham. The date 1684 is on a shield between the gables; and, by a curious coincidence, the lower story -is the office of a firm of auctioneers.

All of which shows how closely Dickens followed local topography, and how clearly he had it in mind, as he built up his tale. No doubt he fancied he could thus give an added verisimilitude to a plot sadly in need of it! Only when there was absolute necessity did he invent a detail — and its invention proves how necessary it was. For instance, there is not and never has been a weir in the river near Cloisterham. Dickens, to furnish an additional clue to the person he wished suspected of the murder, placed a weir about two miles above the town. As has been said already, there was no burial vault in the churchyard such as the one assigned to Sapsea. And the dark, mysterious, Wilkie Collinsey atmosphere which Dickens tried to throw about the cathedral precincts existed, of course, only in his imagination.

Some months ago, the present writer hazarded some conjectures, in The Bookman, as to the outcome of the story. The careful examination of its scene, as here outlined, has added nothing new to these, nor suggested any modification of them, except perhaps a more pronounced leaning toward the belief to which Andrew Lang, after long continued effort to find a reasonable solution, ultimately came: that Dickens himself did not see clearly how the story was to end, and had need to ride most carefully and adroitly to avoid a cropper at the last.

“BOZ” AND BOULOGNE

By Deshler Welch

From: Harper's Magazine, August 1908, p.361-363

CHARLES DICKENS spent three summers in Boulogne-sur-Mer — only a few hours from England, “but if it were three hundred miles farther away, how the English would rave about it!” said he. He thought its picturesqueness, its coloring, and the character of its domestic life filled the eye and fancy quite to the measure of Naples. It was in 1853 that Dickens first went there, and selected a house to live in on the high cliffs then known as the Calais road, and on a recent pilgrimage to Boulogne I set out to find it. I had memoranda with me that told of its situation in the novelist’s own words: “The house is on a great hillside, backed up by woods of young trees. It faces the Haute Ville with the ramparts. . . . On the slope in front, going steep down to the right, all Boulogne is piled and jumbled about in a very picturesque manner. The view is charming — closed in at last by the tops of swelling hills, and the door is within ten minutes of the post-office and a quarter of an hour of the sea. The garden is made in terraces up the hillside, like an Italian garden.”

This was all that I had written down; there had been a great deal more of it, and I remembered to have read in his charming sketch, “Our French Watering Place,” much that in some way had given me impressions of a dreamful and sequestered spot with thousands of roses enveloping it, leaving only enough of it uncovered for the eye of the house to look out upon the sea in its various moods. I gathered, too, that Dickens loved it in the tempest, and when the great sea fog came rolling in.

I began to make my inquiries almost directly I had located in the odd little hotel Meurice on the Rue Victor Hugo. I did not ask to see the fine old landlord, M. Loyal Derasseur, for that was only the fictitious name in the sketch, but I felt that I must behold

Monsieur Beaucourt, the real, amiable, and almost loving host who so won the heart of the novelist.

I was not surprised to find how little was known of Dickens's association with the place, but I was hardly prepared to hear that Monsieur Beaucourt was still remembered, and almost familiarly so, by my French Boniface. Subsequently I learned, from the tourist's most friendly bookseller of Boulogne, where the dear old gentleman was buried — at Condette, a little village near by. I found his grave lying by a Gothic steepled church, covered by a stone cross. On one side is written:

“Ici repose le corps de Monsieur Ferdinand Beaucourt, epoux de Francoise Mutuel, ne a. Bethune, decide a Condette, le 8 Mai, 1881, á Vage de 75 ans et 8 mois.”

But on the other side of it I read these lines that will forever make the name of Monsieur Beaucourt famous:

“The landlord of whom Charles Dickens wrote: ‘ I never did see such a gentle, kind heart.’”

There was everything in the physical conditions of Boulogne, as well as in the times, to have attracted Dickens that first summer. It was in the period of the French-English alliance; the return of the troops from the Crimea, and of the exposition of English paintings, and of the visit of the Prince Consort to the Emperor: and meanwhile he was at work on his Little Dorrit. As for the town itself, it had the fascinating attraction of the old world; its venerable ramparts on which many exiles make their promenade and the streets below where many poets ended their days — such as Le Sage and Campbell. — and it had the charm of “color,” of foreign life, and of water life, and always a brilliant port.

Although I had in some degree informed myself as to the location of Monsieur Beaucourt's “chateau,” through certain unpublished letters of the master that I had been permitted to have and to hold on a former pilgrimage of mine when I visited his Villa Rosemont in Lausanne a few weeks previous, I was nevertheless somewhat mystified now by my surroundings. I finally proceeded along the Grande Rue which ascends to the “Haute Ville,” which is the old part of the town on the height. I passed the Boulevard Mariette and the esplanade, and a little farther on the park of Lea Tintelleries, where the people dance in the summer-time. Three of the four gateways dating back to the thirteenth century still open into the Haute Ville, which is enclosed by ramparts ornamented by turrets. From the Porte de Calais the view was superb. The day was full of glory — full of ozone, and inspiring. Below me stretched the dunes, a train travelling along them with a musical rumble on the way to Calais; near by was the Napoleon Column, and away off in the great distance arose the white cliffs of the English coast. It was a scene that Dickens had often looked upon. I turned back and soon entered the Rue Beaurepaire — not much of a street, — that would lead me, so I was told, right to the chateau where Dickens had dwelt, and which under his familiar penname of “Boz” he had described so lovingly and at much length in his letters and sketches. It was a pretty steep road, shabbily built up, that must have been a charming ramble a half century ago. I was confronted suddenly by a stone wall and a churchlike building, where I had in my mind located the chateau; it had been built on Monsieur Beaucourt’s property, but somewhere nestling in the corner back of it under a group of trees I espied a spot of yellow, and then the chateau itself grew from it, and finally it was all there before me with its triangular pediment and green blinds. There was something of a field around it, sloping to a road that ran up higher beyond it, divided by a wall of cobblestones.

So it was here that “Boz” looked down upon the old town and the great distance; — from here that he looked down into the great depths of mankind and riveted their hearts with the spell of his pen! It was here that Wilkie Collins, Jerrold, and Forster who became his Boswell, used to come and make merry, and where his children played — the children of his flesh. It was with conflicting emotions I thought of that withered past, and out of which the mental child — little Dorrit — was born to live, and live so long that the old ramparts of the town would crumble away during her mere youth. As I sit on the cobbled fence trying to repeople the place in my mind, I open some of his precious letters I have been entrusted with. What a prodigious and warm-hearted correspondent he was! Those with whom he had most to do in a material way were not so well favored as his friends of the heart. In one place he writes (it is headed, “Villa des Moulineaux, Rue Beaurepaire “): “This place is beautiful — a burst of roses. Beaucourt — who will not put on his hat — has thinned the trees and greatly improved the garden.”

Another: “We have a beautiful garden with all its fruits and flowers and a field of our own, and a road of our own away to the Column, and everything that is airy and fresh. The great Beaucourt hovers about us like a guardian genius.” Another: “The prettiest French grounds in the most charming situation I have ever seen, the best place I have ever lived in abroad, except at Genoa. You can scarcely imagine the beauty of the air in this richly wooded hillside.” And one more I finally read that causes me to look sadly at the house and the hillside and on the great beyond: “Do come and pass a little time here. Excellent light wines on the premises, French cookery, millions of roses, two cows (for milk punch), vegetables cut for the pot and handed in at the kitchen window; fine summer-houses, fifteen fountains (with no water in ‘em), and thirty-seven clocks (keeping, as I conceive, Australian time; having no reference to the hours on this side of the globe).”

A great affection sprang up between Dickens and M. Beaucourt. He was an “obliging landlord” of the kind that must have been the last of his race. Said Dickens: “He is wonderful; he is a portly jolly fellow with a fine open face — he is supposed to have mortgaged his business (that of a linen - draper) all along of this place which he has planted with his own hands; which he cultivates all day; and which he never on any consideration speaks of but as ‘the property.’ If the extraordinary things in the house defy description, the amazing phenomena in the gardens never could have been dreamed of by anybody but a Frenchman bent upon one idea. There is a plan of ‘the property’ in the hall. It looks about the size of Ireland; and to every one of the extraordinary objects there is a reference with some portentous name . . . the Cottage of Tom Thumb, the Bridge of Austerlitz, the Bridge of Jena, the Hermitage, the Bower of the Old Guard, the Labyrinth (I have no idea which is which); and there is a guidance to every room in the house, as if it were a place on that stupendous scale that without such a clue you must infallibly lose your way and perhaps perish of starvation between bedroom and bedroom!”

It was the summer of 1853 that Dickens first stopped with M. Beaucourt. In 1854, while still his tenant, he was housed in another cottage higher up the hill which afforded a better view — a great stretch of the sea. It was named the “Villa du Camp de Droite.” It was along the cliffs toward Calais that the French camp was formed, and Dickens watched the making of it with intense interest, although his walks were frequently discommoded by the military arrangements. On the night of the arrival of the Prince Consort the villa was a blaze of glory. Dickens himself set a French flag over the Union Jack flying from a haystack, and judging by all accounts, as I find them in his letters, became a veritable jumping-jack in his excitement over the entente cordiale and the displays of colors, cocked hats, and English condescension.

As I walked along the Calais road in the gloaming, for time had passed so quickly during my retrospection on the cobble wall that I had only witnessed the departure of the day as one would gaze with hypnotic vacancy into an iridescent glass, I came upon another note by “Boz “: “Coming home by the Calais road, covered with dust, I suddenly find myself face to face with Albert and Napoleon jogging along in the pleasantest way, a little in front, talking extremely loud about the view, and attended by a brilliant staff of sixty or seventy horsemen. I took off my wideawake without stopping to stare, whereupon the Emperor pulled off his cocked hat; and Albert (seeing, I suppose, that it was an Englishman) pulled off his.”

It was during his third summer at Boulogne, again at the Villa Moulineaux, that he worked on Little Dorrit. Previous to that it had been on Hard Times and Copperfield. I have no doubt that many of his impressions formed during his prowling around the old town and along the lower streets and the pier shaped themselves somehow in his literary work. Beaucourt must have influenced more than the mere sketch of “Our French Watering Place.” It was in this summer that Wilkie Collins spent several weeks with Dickens, and Jerrold too was a frequent visitor, and it was here that Collins concocted The Frozen Deep. In the late afternoons, as they would discuss their literary co-operation for Household Words, “Boz” would lie at lazy length among the roses, as he said, “middle-aged Love in a blouse and belt,” and in the evening they would wander down to the pier, where I dare say it looked very much as it looks to-day.

I passed once more before the door of the Villa des Moulineaux as I hunted my way back to the gates of Haute Ville. Alas! alas! on the monastic building of which the little villa was now a part was this sign:

“Maison a Vendre ou a Louer.”

As I stood for a moment in contemplation I could not help the weakness — if so it be; my eyes became filled with tears. In the dim and misty light were two figures — Dickens and Beaucourt. It was their last meeting. “And you, Monsieur Beaucourt — you are unfortunate too, God knows!”

“Ah, Monsieur Dickens, thank you; don’t speak it” — ” and backed himself down the avenue with his cap in his hand as if he were going to back himself straight into the evening star!”

DICKENS AND GRAVESEND

By Alex J. Philip

ALTHOUGH Dickens' works are exceedingly popular in Gravesend, and a numerous branch of the Dickens' Fellowship has been founded, it is a curious fact that no effort has been made to establish the very close relationship that existed between the famous novelist and the town, or to identify the town and its surroundings in his works; or to perpetuate the many Dickens' memories connected with the place. This is the more remarkable as all these are not only of the greatest interest from a literary and personal point of view, but they would form a valuable asset from a commercial standpoint, as has been the case elsewhere.

This article is an endeavour to rescue from oblivion the recollections of Dickens in the town, and to segregate the obscure references to Gravesend in the novels, and to emphasise the personal relationship that undoubtedly existed when Dickens was living at Gads Hill Place, on the Rochester Road.

One of the earliest authenticated instances of Dickens' presence in the town, after the commencement of his literary career, dates from the year 1836. A short mile from Gravesend on the Dover Road lies the parish of Chalk. It is now a comparatively populous and prosperous village, and although it has increased considerably since 1836, probably it has not changed so much as might be naturally expected in the passage of more than seventy years. In that year, the year of his first marriage, Dickens spent his honeymoon in this rambling, but characteristic Kentish village. Both the late Mr. Kitton and Laman Blanchard, the former probably on the authority of the latter, decided that what is now known as "The Manor House" was the place of his residence. It is unlikely that any conclusive proof, such as letters dated from his holiday address, will be discovered at this late date, and it is therefore necessary to rely upon extraneous evidence. Fortunately there is a fair amount of a trustworthy nature. The claim on behalf of "The Manor House" rests entirely on a statement of Laman Blanchard (unless Kitton had some private information which he did not put on record) that he generally met Dickens “at the same spot — at the outskirts of the village of Chalk, where a picturesque lane branched off towards Shorne and Cobham . . . the brisk walk of Charles Dickens was always slackened, and he never failed to glance meditatively at the windows of a corner house on the southern side of the road ... it was in that house he lived immediately after his marriage.”

Taking this as the only evidence available on the one side, that on the other is much more conclusive, and may be tabulated as follows: —

(a) In 1836 “The Manor House” was occupied by a M. Lereaux, a French surgeon of some considerable means, sufficient at all events to make it unnecessary for him to take lodgers or boarders.

(b) The gardener at the Manor House in that year is still alive and living in the village. He emphatically states that no newly-married couple stayed at the house in 1836 in any capacity, either as lodgers or guests.

The foregoing may be termed negative evidence; c and d may be classed as positive evidence:

(c) On the authority of some of the oldest inhabitants of the village a honeymoon couple spent some time during the year 1836 in a smaller house situated on the angle of the upper and lower roads less than a hundred yards nearer Gravesend.

(d) The landlady of the house at that time was a Mrs. Craddock, and Mr. Pickwick lodged with a Mrs. Craddock when he went to Bath. The coincidence lies in the fact that Dickens was writing Pickwick at the time he was stopping at Chalk.

When I was making enquiries relating to this subject I asked an ancient light of the village if Dickens stayed here. “No,” replied the old man, “Dickens never stopped there, but Mr. Pickwick, ‘e did. ‘E ‘ad supper there one night and breakfast next morning.”

While dealing with Pickwick it may be of interest to detail the identification of Gravesend and Muggleton. It is impossible within the limits of any article to give the arguments pro and con on all the places in Kent which have been pointed out as the prototype of this fictitious town. There is not the slightest doubt that the identity of the town was intentionally and carefully disguised; no one town in the county answers the description. The suggestions most favourably received many years ago were — Maidstone, Faversham, and Town Malling. But the utmost endeavours of the various partisans failed to establish an unequivocal resemblance. Gravesend was put aside chiefly because it was not fifteen miles from Rochester,

The cottage at Chalk where Charles Dickens spent his boyhood.

whereas it is quite obvious that Dickens relied chiefly upon the misstatement of distance for his disguise. The actual distance between Gravesend and Rochester is about half of the fifteen miles of the book. The resemblance between Muggleton and the old post-town is sufficiently striking to be adduced as evidence. Gravesend has had a mayor and corporation for centuries; and it boasts that it is an “ancient and loyal borough.” As a matter of fact in the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries it frequently paraded its loyalty when in its corporate capacity it desired a concession from the crown. It has a market place dating back some centuries, which in the early 19th century was partly open. A picturesque inn with a large posting connection at that time existed in what is now Milton Road, and the distances between the stages in the chase after Jingle correspond very nearly with those on the road from Gravesend to London, except that Dickens has added one stage; although it is significant that the last stage has no defined limits, nor is it described at any length. Pickwick and Wardle are left on the road to find their way to town, and they next reappear in the inn in the Boro’. But one of the most important pieces of evidence is that found in Pickwickian Manners and Customs. The late Miss Dickens — “Mamie,” as she was affectionately called — in her pleasing and very natural little book, My Father as I Recall Him, has casually dropped a hint which puts us on the right track. When driving on the beautiful back road to Cobham once he pointed out a spot. "There it was," he said, "where Mr. Pickwick dropped his whip." The distressed travellers had to walk some twelve or fourteen miles — about the distance of Muggleton — which was important enough to have a mayor and corporation, etc. We ourselves have walked this road, and it led us to Gravesend. Gravesend we believe to be Muggleton, against all competitors. Further, when chasing Jingle, Wardle went straight from Muggleton to town, as you can do from Gravesend; from which there is a long walk to Cobham.

Having accepted Muggleton as Gravesend, I am now endeavouring to identify Dingley Dell and the Manor Farm, but my evidence is not yet complete, and as it will require and deserve more than the passing notice which would be all it could receive here, I must hold it over for another occasion.

There is little reason to doubt that "one of the most secluded churchyards in Kent, where wild flowers mingle with the grass, and the soft landscape around forms the fairest spot in the garden of England," in which Heyling's wife and child were buried, is the churchyard at Shorne, where in later years Dickens wished to be laid to rest.

David Copperfield contains several references to Gravesend either stated or implied. But it will be found when more careful and exact criticism has been brought to bear upon the subject that Great Expectations contains more allusions to Gravesend and its immediate neighbourhood than any other of Dickens' works, with the exception of the Pickwick Papers. Joe Gargery's forge has been located by popular consent at Cooling, in the marshes. Without any very careful enquiry Kitton accepted this version and gave Cooling as the place in his Dickens' Country. Joe's forge had a door communicating direct with the kitchen; and no such forge is remembered in Cooling. Here again enquiries at Chalk have resulted in an interesting discovery. On the opposite side of the road to that on which Mrs. Craddock's cottage is situated, a rambling forge still stands. It is still possible to see the door which at one time gave direct access from the forge to the kitchen. Not only must Dickens have seen this when stopping in the village in that memorable year 1836, but he must have passed it many times in later life on his walks and drives from Gads Hill to Gravesend, and the marshes of Denton and Chalk are sufficiently close to justify the reference; and, moreover, the smith was well known to Dickens. It is more than probable that the “Ship Inn” mentioned towards the end in Great Expectations is the “Ship and Lobster” in the neighbouring parish of Denton, for many years a famous resort.

Dickens’ personal relations with the town and its surroundings are not less interesting. Chalk Church, with the quaint carvings over the porch, now falling into decay, was a favourite spot with Dickens. Not only this spot but the whole of Chalk was endeared to him, and he promoted village sports and other things which are still affectionately remembered. A red sash — one of the prizes in these sports, and tied on the winner by Dickens himself — still exists in the village.

The “Commercial Hotel,” situated at the western end of the Promenade at Gravesend, is not now so large as it was in Dickens’ time, as the part of the structure lying nearest to the river has been pulled down. The remainder, however, is still much as it was in 1841 when Dickens first “put up” there. The inn was then known as “Waite’s Hotel,” and was perhaps one of the best known and most frequented of the river hotels. Dickens again stopped there for a short time just prior to the completion of the purchase of Gads Hill Place.

The Manor House, Chalk.

“Joe Gangery’s Forge,” Chalk.

Even to those who did not know Dickens he had two distinct features, the one when he drove and the other when he walked through the town, although neither of them can be described as personal. He frequently walked to Gravesend Station when on his way to London some two or three times a week, but when walking for pleasure he was accompanied by two black retrievers, and the dogs became eventually as well known in the district as their master. When driving in his carriage the tinkling of the bells announced his coming some distance away, and with the large affection sometimes found in rural districts, the villagers of Chalk were often overheard to remark — ,” Here comes old Charlie.”

Gads Hill and Cobham, with the far-famed “Leather Bottle,” although more easily reached from Gravesend than from any other point, have been so often described with more or less topographical and historical accuracy that it is not necessary to enter into any details regarding either of the places.

DICKENS IN SWITZERLAND

SOME UNPUBLISHED LETTERS AND REFLECTIONS

By Deshler Welch

ROSEMONT VILLA, LAUSANNE, WHERE CHARLES DICKENS LIVED.
The two middle windows opening on the balcony were in Dickens's study.

AS a devout lover of Charles Dickens and all his works I was extremely gratified during the past summer in being able to take many long journeys by foot and coach in Switzerland over roads and passes that he knew so well and so delightfully described in certain private letters at the time, which have never been printed, and which I now have the privilege of making public. Charles Dickens loved Switzerland. It was his refuge in his hunt for happiness and health; it was his haven when he had the printers after him for "copy." In Geneva, Lausanne, Vevey, and elsewhere along the Rhone Valley in many of the pretty Swiss villages, in the comfort of one of the characteristic inns for a night, he did some of his most effective writing. It was in Switzerland that he wrote The Battle of Life and Dombey and Son and much of David Copperfield and Bleak House, and thought of much more that subsequently entered into his immortal work. If he had never been in Lausanne he never would have created Lady Dedlock, for it was there that he formulated her character through suggestive conditions. It was there that Dickens had the beginnings of many corollaries in the friendships that controlled much of his future life.

The villa Rosemont was his summer residence first in 1846. The room in which he did his writing occupied the two centre windows of the balcony, and as he sat there and wrote, his eyes often rested in a transport of admiration on the wonderful hues of Lake Geneva and the mountains of Savoy. It was there he first met the Hon. Richard and Mrs. Watson of Rockingham Castle, England, and M. de Cerjat, with whom he corresponded during the rest of their mutual lives, and also Mr. Haldimand. It was to Mr. and Mrs. Watson that he dedicated his own favorite book, David Copperfield, and it is with his copious flow of letters to them that I have now to do- — a correspondence full of the utmost human feeling in its most triumphant moods. These priceless documents of unaffected genius, and domestic sweetness beyond all else in autobiographical literature I ever read, were confided to me by the Baroness von Roeder, the daughter of Mrs. Watson, and whose birth and youth were objects of much solicitude to Dickens. I felt it indeed a privilege to be permitted the acquaintance of this charming woman at her summer home in Interlaken, and to hear from her lips the interesting details concerning his every-day life. "It was a most remarkable friendship, that sprang up between Mr. Dickens and my father and mother," said the Baroness, "and these letters show but a small part of it. It was wonderful that he had the time and the patience to attend to the private correspondence that he did and he filled it so full of passing detail and serious observation that one wonders that he could have afforded the expenditure of so much valuable material. He appeared to be much broken by my father's death, but after it he kept up his letter-writing with my mother with the same bubbling over thoughts and rare good literature. Of course I was very young up to the time of his death, but I have a splendid memory of the man — of his combination of tenderness and ruggedness, and his affectionate nature, that showed itself in his communication with men and women alike. In his family he was companionable. He loved to write books and letters and to read before an audience and to act on the stage, as every one knows, but few could comprehend how much of a passion all this amounted to. Yet his ideas of home life were full of extraordinary sentiment; he had the most happy thoughts of the coziness of the fireside — he liked to contemplate it and meditate before it, and in pleasant mental arraignment of his friends it was always in the glamour of a fireside circle. He was moderate in his eating and drinking, but to hear him speak of plum pudding or of a glass of mulled wine was enough to make one's mouth water — you remember the famous 'Plum Pudding' edition of his books?"

The Honorable Mrs. Watson

To her and her husband Dickens dedicated his favorite book, David Copperfield

The Dickens - Watson correspondence extended over a period of nearly twenty years, beginning after the Lausanne summer in 1846, the first communication from Dickens being a recipe for a summer drink which he christened "Moonbeams," and I give space to it here as a valuable addition to a book of recipes entirely made up from the devices of famous men, to be headed by Thackeray's "Bouillabaisse."

I have written it in the shape that Dickens wrote it — arrangement of the lines and punctuations and dashes.

In 1849, December 29, in writing to his friend Cerjat, Dickens said, in speaking of a recent visit to Rockingham Castle:

We had a most delightful time at Watson's (for both of them we have preserved and strengthened a real affection), and were the gayest of the gay. There was a Miss Boyle staying in the house, who is an excellent amateur actress, and she and I got up some scenes from the "School for Scandal" and from "Nickleby" with immense success. We played in the old hall, with the audience filled up and overrunning with servants. The entertainments concluded with feats of legerdemain (for the performance of which I have a pretty good apparatus collected at divers times and in divers places), and we then fell to country dances of a most frantic description, and danced all night. Watson and I have some fifty times registered a vow (like O'Connel) to come to Lausanne together, and have even settled in what month and week. Something or other has always interposed to prevent us; but I hope, please God, most certainly to see it again, when my labors Copperfieldian shall have terminated.

On July 3, 1850, Dickens wrote from Devonshire Terrace to the Watsons:

I am in a very despondent state of mind over Peel's death. He was a man of mark, who would be ill-spared from the great Dust Heap down at Westminster. When I think of the joy of the Disraeli's, Richmond and other Importers and Humbugs I think of flying to Australia and taking to the bush. What do you think of entering into the scheme, asking Haldimand to join us, and founding a settlement to be called the Paradox 1

Every one is cheering David on, and I hope to make your book a good one. I like it very much myself — thoroughly believe it all and go to the work every month with an energy of the finest description.

In August, 1852, Dickens lost one of his very dearest friends — thus cutting off one of the tenderest associations of Switzerland — Richard Watson. He had visited Rockingham Castle in the spring and had been shocked at his friend's decline, although there seemed no need to fear that the inevitable in life would come so soon. 'He dined with Dickens at Tavistock House in July, but, in August. Dickens wrote:

"My dear Watson! Dead after that illness of four days. I loved him as my heart, and cannot think of him without tears."

In 1852 Dickens wrote to Mrs. Watson giving his impressions of Uncle Tom's Cabin. Parts of this letter were published in a collection of letters after his death, but it is here printed as he wrote it, for the first time:

In the matter of Uncle Tom's Cabin. I partly though not entirely agree with Mr. James. No doubt a much lower art will serve for the handling of such a subject in fiction, than for a launch on the sea of imagination without such a powerful bark; but there are many points in the book very admirably done. There is a certain St. Clair, a New Orleans gentleman, who seems to me to be conceived with great power and originality. If he had not a Grecian outline of face, which I began to be a little tired of in him in earliest infancy, I should think him unexceptionable. He has a sister too, a maiden lady from New England, in whose person the besetting weakness and prejudices of the Abolitionists themselves, on the subject of the blacks, are set forth in the liveliest and truest colors and with the greatest boldness. She (I mean Mrs. Stowe) is a leetle unscrupulous in the appropriatin' way. I seem to see a writer with whom I am very intimate (and whom nobody can possibly admire more than myself) peeping very often through the thinness of the paper. Further I descry the ghost of Mary Barton, and the very palpable mirage of a scene in the children of the mist; but in spite of this I consider the book a fine one, with a great and gallant purpose in it and worthy of its reputation.

ROCKINGHAM CASTLE, ENGLAND, HOME OF THE WATSONS
The original of Dickens's "Chesney Wold"

In 1853 Dickens was very hard at work on Bleak House. The subject of it had entered his mind during that summer in Lausanne, and Mrs. Watson was the original of Lady Dedlock in outward drawing, as was her home, Rockingham Castle, the original of Chesney Wold. He wrote to her from the Villa de Moulineaux, Boulogne, on August 27, on the subject, saying: "Lowestoft I know, by walking over there from Yarmouth, when I went down on an exploring expedition, previous to 'Copperfield.' It is a fine place. I saw the name 'Blunderstone' on a direction-post between it and Yarmouth, and took it from the said direction-post for the book. In some of the descriptions of Chesney Wold, I have taken many bits, chiefly about trees and shadows, from observations made at Rockingham. I wonder whether you have ever thought so!"

Now as to the "Skimpole" talk of the time. It is well known in literary controversy that Dickens was accused of holding up his quondam friend Leigh Hunt in that character. I will not say here that I have discovered in the Watson letters any verification of that. On September 25, 1853, Dickens wrote to Mrs. Watson from Boulogne:

Skimpole. I must not forget Skimpole — of whom I will proceed to speak as if I had only read him and not written him. I suppose he is the most exact portrait that was ever painted in words! I have very seldom, if ever, done such a thing. But the likeness is astonishing. I don't think it could possibly be more like himself. It is so awfully true that I make a bargain with myself

FACSIMILE OF FIRST PAGE OF A LETTER FROM DICKENS TO MRS. WATSON

Saturday Twenty-Sixth October 1850.

My Dear Mrs. Watson.

As Copperfield is your book, you know, it has occurred to me that you might possibly like to see the end of it before the rest of the world does. Being in town to-day, I send you the sheets of the conclusion. Will you and Watson (to whom my love) kindly keep them to ourselves until publication-time?

They are not finally corrected, and have several verbal errors in them, I dare say. We return to town on Monday evening for good. I am going to meet Kate and Georgina at Tunbridre Wells this afternoon, on my way home. Believe me, dear Mrs. Watson,

Very faithfully yours,
Charles Dickens.

“never to do so any more.” There is not an atom of exaggeration or suppression. It is an absolute reproduction of a real man. Of course I have been careful to keep the outward figure away from the fact; but in all else it is the life itself.

The summer of 1853 was spent in Boulogne, as I have said, at an old chateau that he had heard of, and leased from its Switzerland owner. He described it as “a queer old French place, but extremely well supplied with all table and other conveniences . . . standing in the middle of a great garden surrounded by flowers.” It was on the Rue Beaurepaire, on a green hillside, overlooking a beautiful open country. It was during this and successive summers at Boulogne that he worked on Bleak House and Little Dorrit. In a letter to Mrs. Watson from Folkestone he tells her that the name first proposed for the latter story was “Nobody’s Fault.” In 1854 Mr. Dickens left the old chateau in Boulogne and rented the Villa du Camp de Droite of the same landlord, M. Beaucourt. It was on the top of a still higher hill, and it was there that he began Hard Times. In the summer of 1856, however, Dickens returned to the Villa Moulineaux.

In the letter, of which the first page is printed here in facsimile, the large flourish to the signature was carefully preserved as it really was up to the time of his death. He frequently joked about it in his letters. On one occasion he wrote to Mrs. Watson: “P. S. — I am in such an incapable state, that after executing the foregoing usual flourish I swooned, and remained for some time insensible. Ha, ha, ha! Why was I ever restored to consciousness!!!”

At another time: “P. S. — I find I am not equal to the flourish.”

In much of his correspondence with the Watsons I find frequent and insistent reference to Switzerland — especially to Lausanne and Lake Lehman. Of the latter he wrote: “It runs with a spring tide, that will always flow and never ebb, through my memory; and nothing less than the waters of Lethe shall confuse the music of its running until it loses itself in that great sea, for which all the currents of our life are desperately bent.” He painted it in many of his books; if not so as every dog could read it, there were many indications of the Alpine atmosphere perfectly apparent to his friends. He loved it greatly in retrospection — Mont Blanc, St. Bernard, the Wetterhorn, Jungfrau, Monch, and Eiger; and above all, the Matterhorn in its lonely majesty — theatrical almost in its impassiveness and dramatically significant in its mysteries, terrors, and tragedies! Then he liked the quiet rest of their valleys, that he said often daunted him compared to the reality of a stirring life.

CHARLES DICKENS' MANUSCRIPTS

From: Potter's American Monthly, February 1878, p.156-158

Charles Dickens's Manuscripts. — A glimpse of the manuscripts of the late Charles Dickens, which now form part of the "Forster Collection" in the South Kensington

Museum, conjures up a vision of numerous characters in his popular novels. On looking attentively at the manuscripts, we are at once struck by the number of alterations and interlineations with which the pages abound; and our first sentiment is one of surprise that the books which appear so wonderfully natural and fluent when we read them, should evidently have been the result of much anxious thought, care, and elaboration.

The collection comprises the original manuscripts of the following works: "Oliver Twist," published in 1838-39; "Master Humphrey's Clock," comprising "The Old Curiosity Shop" and "Barnaby Rudge," published in 1840-41; "Barnaby Rudge," a separate volume, 1840-41; "American Notes," 1842; "Martin Chuzzlewit," 1843-44; "The Chimes," Christmas, 1844; "Dombey and Son," 1846-48; "David Copperfield," 1849-50; "Bleak House," which has in the original manuscript a secondary title, "The East Wind," 1852-53; "Hard Times," 1854; "Little Dorrit," 1855-57; "A Tale of Two Cities," 1859; and "The Mystery of Edwin Drood" (his last but unfinished work), 1870. There are also proof volumes from the printers, consisting of "Dombey and Son," "David Copperfield," "Bleak House," and "Little Dorrit," the pages of which bear marginal and other corrections and alterations, in ink, by the author.

Of course, as the collection is placed under a glass case, the public can only see one or two pages of each work; but even with this meagre guide, the acute observer is able in some degree to trace the working of the writer's mind, and to follow to some extent the development of his ideas. As we have already remarked, the first thing which strikes us is the comparatively large number of alterations and interlineations which occur in the manuscript. It is evident that Charles Dickens wrote with the greatest care, and scrupulously revised his writing, in order to render each sentence as perfect as might be. Taking the works in their chronological order, we may notice that in "Oliver Twist," which is open at "Chapter the Twelfth" — "In which Oliver is taken better care of than he ever was before, with some particulars concerning a certain picture" — there are few alterations in the manuscript; the writing also being larger and firmer than in the majority of the later works. Charles Dickens made his alterations so carefully that it is difficult to trace the words which he had originally written; but the one or two which occur on this page give us some little insight into the careful manner in which the author worked up his sentences into a well-rounded and euphonious form. The passage at which this manuscript is opened runs as follows: "The coach rattled away down Mount Pleasant and up Exmouth Street — over nearly the same ground as that which Oliver had traversed when he first entered London in," and here occurs the first alteration, " the D "is erased, and "company with the Dodger," is written in its place; the author evidently considering the latter a more euphonious form of expression than "in the Dodger's company," as it was doubtless his original intention to make the passage. The alteration to which we have referred may appear, as indeed it is, of exceedingly small significance; but we have mentioned it simply as an instance of the extremely careful way in which Dickens studied the details and minutiae of composition.

The next manuscript in point of date is "Master Humphrey's Clock," which is open at "No. IV.," headed, "Master Humphrey from his clock-side in the chimney coiner," and commences as follows: "Night is generally my time for walking. In the summer I often leave home early in the morning and roam about fields and lanes all day, or even escape for days or weeks together; but, saving in the country" [this originally stood " but at other seasons of the year;" but Dickens doubtless saw that the expression as it now stands would be more consistent with the context], "I seldom go out until after dark, though, heaven be thanked, I love its light and feel the cheerfulness it sheds upon the earth as much as any creature living." This page of manuscript has only a moderate share of alterations.

Then we come to the volume of "Barnaby Rudge," which is opened at "Chapter One," and also contains only a moderate number of alterations, one being in the height of the Maypole sign, and another in the distance of Epping Forest from Cornhill; both of which are noticeable as further illustrations of the conscientious love of accuracy which characterized the author's mind. Next in order follows the "American Notes," which has very few corrections, and is opened at the page headed "Chapter the First. Introductory and necessary to be read;" in which the author challenges the right of any person "to pass judgement on this book or to arrive at any reasonable conclusion in reference to it without first being at the trouble of becoming acquainted with its design and purpose." Surely a caution fair and reasonable enough on the part of the writer of a book which he could not but feel would probably give offence, where such an end was farthest from his wish.

"The Life and Adventures of Martin Chuzzlewit" comes next, open at "Chapter I. Introductory. Concerning the pedigree of the Chuzzlewit Family;" and giving us a brief but telling satire on the pride of birth by assuring us that this family "undoubtedly descended in a direct line from Adam and Eve, and was in the very earliest times closely connected with the agricultural interest." This page is notably full of alterations, and seems a fair indication that with Charles Dickens, as with many others, the first step was the most difficult of all. The caligraphy in this as in all the other manuscripts is legible but rather small, the letters being distinctly formed, and the use of abbreviations studiously avoided.

We next turn to "The Chimes," one of those delightful stories with which Dickens introduced to us those Christmas annuals, which now form so important a section of our periodical literature. This again is open at the commencement, where the author lays down the dogma that there are not many people who would care to sleep in a church: "I don't mean at sermon-time in warm weather (when the thing has actually been done once or twice), but in the night and alone." This sentence originally finished with "in the night;" but we can readily imagine the development of the idea in the brain of the writer, and the words "and alone" suggesting themselves as lending an additional ground of fear for the situation. The manuscript of this page bears a moderate number of alterations.

In "Dombey and Son" we find a large number of alterations on the first page, the very title itself having been altered more than once. The sketch of the newly-born Paul, who was placed in front of the fire, "as if his constitution were analogous to that of a muffin, and it was essential to toast him brown while he was very new," is very good indeed; but it is evident that the passage was rather the result of careful elaboration than of spontaneous humor. And the same remark will apply to the opening chapter of "David Copperfield," in which, although the passage descriptive of the birth of the hero is very neat and natural as it now stands the same careful revision and alteration are again apparent.

"Bleak House" too is notably full of alterations on the first page, especially in the passage which tells us that in the muddy condition of the London streets "it would not be wonderful to meet a mesalosaurus forty feet long or so waddling like an elephantine lizard up Holborn Hill."

In "Hard Times," where we are introduced to the gentleman who wants nothing but "facts," and in the opening chapter of "Little Dorrit," in which we have a description of Marseilles as it "lay broiling in the sun one day," we find a large number of alterations; but in these, as in most of the other instances, the primary words have been erased so carefully that it is next to impossible to form an idea of how the passages originally stood. "The Tale of Two Cities," on the contrary, contains remarkably few corrections; and the opening passage descriptive of "the period" is telling, and apparently written spontaneously. "The Mystery of Edwin Drood" has been opened with good judgment at the last page. The manuscript is very small, but fairly legible, and having but a moderate number of alterations. In a literary sense, it is not perhaps so interesting as some of the others; but it possesses a sad and melancholy claim upon our attention and sympathy, inasmuch as it is the last page of manuscript ever written by this gifted hand.

In the proof volumes with corrections in the handwriting of the author there is nothing which calls for special note save an unimportant deletion in "Bleak House," and a more interesting alteration in "David Copperfield." In the former there is a passage marked "out," in which Sir Leicester Dedlock speaks to Mrs. Rouncewell of her grandson in the following passage: "If (he said) the boy could not settle down at Chesney Wold, in itself the most astonishing circumstance in the world, could he not serve his country in the ranks of her defenders, as his brother had done? Must he rush to her destruction at his early age and with his parricidal hand strike at her!"

In "David Copperfield" we find by a passage in which Mr. Dick is referring to his memorial that his original hallucination took the form of a "bull in a china shop;" a rather trite idea, and it was not until after the proof had actually been submitted to him by the printers that Charles Dickens introduced the whimsical and happier notion of "King Charles's Head."

Before bringing our brief paper to a conclusion, we would venture to suggest to the gentleman or gentlemen to whom is intrusted the arrangement of these manuscripts, that the present position of the manuscripts and printed volumes should be transposed, so that the manuscripts should occupy the lower half of the case, as in their present position it is rather difficult to decipher the caligraphy; and to any one below the ordinary height it must involve an amount of physical contortion as uncomfortable as it is inelegant. The manuscript being of course of greater interest than the printed proofs, should certainly occupy the more prominent space, especially as the latter could be read without any difficulty if placed in the rear rank.

We have no doubt that many of those who read this short article will have seen the Dickens manuscripts for themselves; many more doubtless will see them; but there will still be a large number who will not have the opportunity; and while we think that our remarks will be endorsed by the first and second classes, we hope that they will prove interesting to the third less fortunate class, and will enable them to enjoy, at least in imagination, a somewhat closer intimacy than they have known before with that great and gifted man, whose books have effected so many beneficial changes both in society at large and in many an individual heart and life, uprooting and casting to the winds much that was base, worthless, and contemptible, and implanting in their stead the seeds of those gentler sympathies and nobler aspirations which find their fruition in a well-spent life — the highest tribute to moral worth and excellency of character.

DICKENS

From: Memoir of Henry Compton, Edited by Charles and Edward Compton, Tinsley Brothers, 1879, p.192-196

The author, who has appealed to a larger audience than that of any of his contemporaries, is the next to be considered. Dickens, from this point, is the English novelist of the present century. My father's reading of Dickens began with the first number of "Pickwick," and ended with the last number of "Edwin Drood." When "Pickwick" came out he was in the country with Mr. Chute. He would often recall how, when their appetites had been whetted by the earlier numbers, they would eagerly look for the next number. With what a zest it was read; with what frequent laughter was the reading interrupted; what discussions they had over Sam Weller and his aged parent, over the simple Pickwick and the artful Jingle! I have before referred to my father's delight in humour; it was in Dickens's humour — free, fresh, and unequalled — that he found the quality common to them both. The strength of that first impression was never lessened; "Pickwick" remained his favourite novel of Dickens throughout his life. The works of Dickens are too numerous for me to give my father's opinions of them separately, and I must therefore only endeavour to give his view of Dickens's genius as a whole.

Dickens's distinctive qualities he considered to be humour and accurate delineation of the lower classes. Of his humour my father never tired; he declared it to be the best of its style ever produced or likely to be produced. His difference from his predecessors was not more marked than his distance from his imitators — a class for which my father had a very decided antipathy. As to Dickens's portrayal of lowlife, he thought it alone sufficient to have made the author's success. This opinion was valuable, as he knew London low life better than nine-tenths of Dickens's readers, having gained his knowledge by observation, not from reading. Great geniuses have great faults, and my father was not one of those injudicious admirers who insist on the absolute perfection of Dickens's works. He thought that the humorist was greater than the novelist, the man than the author. He thought that the habit of writing against a grievance, or with a purpose, as it is called, a special defect of Dickens. He perceived a tendency to exaggeration, and a want of connection in plot, which weakened the effect of some of his best works. But though he was ready to acknowledge defects in Dickens, there was no warmer advocate of his distinctive qualities than my father. The praise of a reader who discriminates impartially is more valuable than that of one who follows the fashion of lauding unreservedly the successful author. My father had made Dickens's acquaintance shortly before his marriage, and they afterwards became intimate. He frequently visited at Dickens's house, where he met the most celebrated men of the day. The dining tables were purposely made very narrow, to facilitate opposite guests talking with one another. Sometimes the end of the table touched a mirror, which reflected the whole scene, and increased the brilliance of its appearance. "These dinner-parties," he said, "were very enjoyable." Dickens himself was a faultless host, and knew the art of putting his guests at their ease, so that each appeared at his best. The example of their host's brilliance and animation aroused the energies of this company, causing each individual to exert his powers of entertainment and conversation to their utmost. The effect was what would be expected from the entertainer and his friends. Every subject of the day came under the discussion of the men best fitted to discuss it; politics, literature, and the drama were each treated with a felicity of phrase, a practical knowledge, and a subtlety of discrimination seldom met with. A rare humour and keen wit were brought to the consideration of every theme, with sometimes a boldness of paradox that refreshed and delighted the company. Altogether, my father said he had been to few parties where the pleasure was more exquisite and more sustained. It was always a matter of regret to him that the domestic affairs of the great humorist should have interrupted an intercourse productive of the intellectual enjoyment he preferred to any other amusement.

THE SHADOW ON DICKENS'S LIFE

By Edwin P. Whipple

From: The Atlantic Monthly, August 1877, p.227-233

The first number of the romance of Little Dorritt was issued on January 1, 1856, and was concluded in June (a double number), 1857. The work has a twofold interest: first, because in writing it Dickens had begun to doubt the fertility of his genius in creating new forms of character, and secondly, because he was discontented with his home and was brooding over the ideal ills which led to his separation from his wife.

It may be said, also, that his misgivings regarding the continuance of his creative impulse were connected with his domestic disappointments. Both seem to have sprung from a pervading restlessness of body and mind, beginning about the year 1854, and culminating in the breaking up of his home in May, 1858. As his representations of life and character increased in earnestness and depth with the growth of his genius, they required more and more isolation of mind to be adequately embodied; and this isolation he either found it difficult to secure, or was indisposed to make sacrifices in order to obtain it. Apart from social distractions interfering with his serious work, he threw himself with ardor into political agitation for administrative reforms, and engaged heartily in "quasi - public" private theatricals for charitable objects. This mode of life, however consistent with the comparatively superficial characterization of Pickwick and Nickleby, springing as it did from the happy combination of spontaneous genius with glad animal spirits, was not favorable to the more intense and profound characterizations of his later works, which exacted complete and long continued self - absorption in the imagined persons whose interior and external life he aimed to realize and make actual. He thought his genius was deserting him when he should have seen that he was rather deserting his genius. The root of the difficulty was in his domestic discontents. He felt " an unhappy loss or want of something;" his imagination pampered this sense of loss and want by suggesting ideals of wives and children which were perfect in themselves; and hence, in the words of David Copperfield, he began to live, mentally, in the "so happy and yet so unhappy existence which seeks its realities in unrealities, and finds its dangerous comfort in a perpetual escape from the disappointment of heart around it." To this mood of mind we undoubtedly owe such beautiful embodiments of domestic perfection as Florence Dombey, Agnes, Esther Summerson, and Little Dorrit; but the period when he realized these ideals in his imagination was the same period in which his morbid discontent with his own domestic establishment was most marked. Harriet Martineau, in a letter dated March 20, 1873, referring to Forster's Life of Dickens, says: "In the second volume, I am much struck by Dickens's hysterical restlessness. It must have been terribly wearing to his wife. His friends ought to have seen that his brain was in danger, — from apoplexy, not insanity. To how great extent the women of his family are ignored in the book! The whole impression left by it is very melancholy." Yet Miss Martineau had in her Autobiography — written in 1855, when she felt she was under sentence of death — previously declared: "Every indication seems to show that the man [Dickens] himself is rising. He is a virtuous and happy family man, in the first place. His glowing and generous heart is kept steady by the best domestic influences; and we may fairly hope now that he will fulfill the natural purpose of his life, and stand by literature to the last; and again that he will be an honor to the high vocation by prudence as well as by power, so that the graces of genius and generosity may rest on the finest basis of probity and prudence; and that his old age may be honored as heartily as his youth and manhood have been admired. Nothing could exceed the frank kindness and consideration shown by him in the correspondence and the personal intercourse we have had; and my cordial regard has grown with my knowledge of him."

Miss Martineau, as a critic of persons she knew, never sinned on the side of toleration. Her picture, however, of Dickens as a husband and father, was altogether too flattering at the time (1855) she wrote the panegyric. A year at least before this period his morbid discontent with matters connected with his household had flashed out in his correspondence with his father-confessor, John Forster. His restlessness then, and for nearly four years afterwards, is evident in his private letters. "Too late," he says, in reply to

Forster's monitions, "to put the curb on. I have no relief but in action. I am incapable of rest. I am quite confident I should rust, break, and die if I spared myself. Much better to die, doing. What I am in that way, nature made me first, and my way of life has of late, alas, confirmed. . . . I have felt of myself that I must, please God, die in harness. ... It is much better to go on and fret than to stop and fret. As to repose — for some men there 's no such thing in this life. . . . The old days — the old days! shall I ever, I wonder, get the frame of mind back as it used to be then? Something of it, perhaps, but never quite as it used to be. / find that the skeleton in my domestic closet in becoming a pretty big one." Again he writes, in 1857: "Poor Catherine [his wife] and I are not made for each other, and there is no help for it. It is not only that she makes me uneasy and unhappy, but I make her so too, and much more so. She is exactly what you know, in the way of being amiable and complying; but we are strangely ill-assorted for the bond there is between us. God knows she would have been a thousand times happier if she had married another kind of man, and that her avoidance of this destiny would have been at least equally good for us both. I am often cut to the heart by thinking what a pity it is, for her own sake, that I ever fell in her way; and if I were sick or disabled to-morrow, I know how sorry she would be, and how deeply grieved myself, to think we have lost each other. Her temperament will not go with mine. It mattered not so much when we had only ourselves to consider, but reasons have been growing since which make it all but hopeless that we should try even to struggle on." . . . "You," he replies to Forster's remonstrance, "are not so tolerant as perhaps you might be of the wayward and unsettled feeling which is part (I suppose) of the tenure on which one holds an imaginative life, and which I have, as you ought to know well, often only kept down by riding over it like a dragoon — but let that go by. I make no maudlin complaint. I agree with you as to the very possible incidents, even not less bearable than mine, that might and must often occur to the married condition when it is entered into very young. I am always deeply sensible of the wonderful exercise I have of life and its highest sensations, and have said to myself for years, and have honestly and truly felt, this is the drawback to such a career, and is not to be complained of. I say it and feel it now as strongly as ever I did; and, as I told you in my last, I do not with that view put all this forward. But the years have not made it easier to bear for either of us; and, for her sake as well as mine, the wish will force itself upon me that something might be done. I know too well it is impossible. There is the fact, and that is all one can say. Nor are you to suppose that I disguise from myself what might be urged on the other side. I claim no immunity from blame. There is plenty of fault on my side, I dare say, in the way of a thousand uncertainties, caprices, and difficulties of disposition; but only one thing will alter that, the end that alters everything.”

These private confidences to Forster are valuable as exhibiting Dickens’s moral and mental condition during the four years preceding his final separation from his wife. In March, 1858, when he had concluded to give public readings from his works for his own benefit, as he had given them before for charitable objects, he wrote to Forster: “Quite dismiss from your mind any reference whatever to present circumstances at home. Nothing can put them right, until we are all dead and buried and risen. It is not with me a matter of will, or trial, or sufferance, or good humor, or making the best of it, or making the worst of it, any longer. It is all despairingly over. Have no lingering hope of or for me, in this association. A dismal failure has to be borne, and there an end.” The formal separation occurred in May, 1858. “Henceforward,” says Forster, “he and his wife dwelt apart. The eldest son went with his mother, Dickens at once giving effect to her expressed wish in this respect; and the other children remained with himself, their intercourse with Mrs. Dickens being left entirely to themselves.

If we read Dickens’s confessions to Forster in connection with numerous passages in David Copperfield, Bleak House, and Little Dorrit, we have little trouble in deciding that the cause of the separation between husband and wife was “incompatibility” of disposition and character. It will be remembered that Miss Martineau, after reading Forster’s biography of her friend, speaks of his “hysterical restlessness” as something which must have been “terribly wearing to his wife.” From this we are led to suppose that Mrs. Dickens, no less than Mr. Dickens, had reasons for believing that each would be happier by living apart from the other; and the separation itself was the result of a mutual agreement. There was no evidence presented at the time, and no evidence has since been brought forward, that the husband was guilty of that crime which, in England, is vaguely indicated in the phrase of “keeping two establishments.” There was nothing in the case which could have justified a suit for divorce, on the part of either husband or wife. Forster, who was the friend of both, had exerted all his influence to prevent the separation; and, when his endeavors proved fruitless, he declared it to be an "arrangement of a strictly private nature," and "that no decent person could have had excuse for regarding it in any other light." But the fact was that, as soon as the "arrangement" was known, persons who would have been shocked at not being classed among decent people began at once to circulate rumors invented by indecent persons as to the true cause of the separation. Now Dickens was known wherever the English language was read, and it therefore took but a very short time to make a world-wide scandal out of this "strictly private" affair. In India, Australia, and the United States, as well as in Great Britain, the news was industriously circulated that the great romancer, whose special distinction it was that he had shed new consecrations around the fireside and the home, was a hypocrite and an adulterer, who had imposed on the public by a Pecksniffian pretension to sentiments of purity and honor which his conduct belied. As the lies were in some degree circumstantial, they became a matter of wonder for a fortnight or a month, and were then consigned to the social gutters from which such lies commonly originate. Burke speaks somewhere of those occasions which furnish delicious opportunities for "low, sordid, ungenerous, and reptile souls to swell with their hoarded poisons;" and the moment that Dickens's separation from his wife was known, such creatures began to distribute their poisonous gossip through the whole community of Dickens's readers. The present writer clearly remembers with what a shock of painful surprise he first heard a circumstantial statement of these horrible calumnies, and how eager he was for an authoritative denial of them. Forster, in his biography, thinks that Dickens made a mistake in printing in Household Words his reply to these aspersions; but Dickens knew, as by a sort of subtle freemasonry, that his readers all over the world would hear of the scandal, and would demand some explanation. As he was on the point of appearing in person before the public as a reader, it was specially important that his audiences should know that he did not submit to the imputation of being a heartless adulterer without a sturdy protest. The additional "private letter," given to Mr. Arthur Smith "as an authority for correction of false rumors and scandals," was published against his wish and intention. He always referred to it afterwards as the "violated letter."

In the communication printed in Household Words, Dickens says little which the libels on him did not compel him to say. The periodical itself might have been banished from all respectable families, had its editor, by his silence, given a kind of sanction to the calumnies noised about him. The calumnies, to be sure, were the creations of that body of scandal-mongers who have been aptly classed as “ intermediate links between man and the baboon; “ but still, in his case, they were calculated to have a pernicious effect on his reputation and popularity; for he had, by his works, domesticated himself as a member of the countless families that rejoiced in his genius, and an indelible stain fixed on his domestic character would have closed against him the doors which had previously gladly opened to receive him as an ever welcome ideal guest. The tone of the letter in which he made his direct communication with the public was that of a wronged man, suffering under partially suppressed impulses of moral irritation and moral wrath. “Some domestic trouble of mine,” he says, “of long standing, on which I will make no further remark than that it claims to be respected, as being of a sacredly private nature, has lately been brought to an arrangement which involves no anger or ill-will of any kind, and the whole origin, progress, and surrounding circumstances of which have been throughout within the knowledge of my children. It is amicably composed, and its details have now but to be forgotten by those concerned in it. By some means, arising out of wickedness, or out of folly, or out of inconceivable wild chance, or out of all three, this trouble has been made the occasion of misrepresentations most grossly false, most monstrous, and most cruel, — involving not only me, but innocent persons dear to my heart, and innocent persons of whom I have no knowledge, if, indeed, they have any existence, — and so widely spread, that I doubt that if one reader in a thousand will peruse these lines, by whom some touch of the breath of these slanderers will not have passed, like an unwholesome air. Those who know me and my nature need no assurance under my hand that such calumnies are as irreconcilable with me as they are, in their frantic incoherence, with one another. But there is a great multitude who know me through my writings, and who do not know me otherwise; and I cannot bear that one of them should be left in doubt, or hazard of doubt, through my poorly shrinking from taking the unusual means to which I now resort, of circulating the truth. I most solemnly declare, then, — and this I do both in my own name and in my wife’s name, — that all the lately whispered rumors touching the trouble at which I have glanced are abominably false; and that whosoever repeats one of them, after this denial, will lie as willfully and as foully as it is possible for any false witness to lie, before heaven and earth.”

All this was thoroughly manly, resolute, and noble. There was no reference to the interior, the real causes of discontent between the husband and wife, such as were stated in the private letters (from which we have already largely quoted) of Dickens to Forster. But Dickens conceived that something further must be done to vindicate his character. Mr. Arthur Smith was the person selected to be the business manager of his public readings; and he wrote to him an elaborate, half-defiant, half apologetic letter, containing the private reasons which led to his separation from Mrs. Dickens. This letter was accompanied with a note to this effect: “You have not only my full permission to show this, but I beg you to show it to any one who wishes to do me right, or to any one who has been misled into doing me wrong.” Mr. Smith not only showed it to individuals whose false impressions he desired to correct, but gave a copy of it to the London correspondent of the New York Tribune, in which paper it was published in full, and thence made the tour of the world. Such letters, indeed, written to be shown to this person and that, but not to be published, ever end in getting into print. Rufus Choate, in a Whig speech delivered during the ex; cited period when Polk was a candidate for the Presidency of the United States, had occasion to quote almost the whole of a private letter signed by prominent antislavery democrats, which had been “surreptitiously” published in a New York journal. When he had completed the reading of it he affected to be suddenly startled, and, holding the newspaper up before the eyes of the immense audience, he added, with an inimitable look of mock gravity: “By the way, gentlemen, I find that this document is marked ‘private and confidential,’ and such, I trust, you will all consider it!” So it may be said in regard to Dickens’s “violated “ letter to Arthur Smith, that it contained information which invited violation, and which was sure to fall into the hands of some one who would violate it.

Before commenting on this letter it is but just to reprint it.

London, W. E., Tavistock House, Tavistock Square, Tuesday, May 25, 1858.

To Arthur Smith, Esq.: Mrs. Dickens and I have lived unhappily together for many years. Hardly any one who has known us intimately can fail to have known that we are, in all respects of character and temperament, wonderfully unsuited to each other. I suppose that no two people, not vicious in themselves, ever were joined together who had a greater difficulty in understanding one another, or who had less in common. An attached woman servant (more friend to both of us than a servant), who lived with us sixteen years, and is now married, and who was and still is in Mrs. Dickens's confidence and mine, who had the closest familiar experience of this unhappiness in London, in the country, in France, in Italy, wherever we have been, year after year, month after month, week after week, day after day, will bear testimony to this.

Nothing has, on many occasions, stood between us and a separation but Mrs. Dickens's sister, Georgina Hogarth. From the age of fifteen she has devoted herself to our house and our children. She has been their playmate, nurse, instructress, friend, protectress, adviser, companion. In the manly consideration towards Mrs. Dickens which I owe to my wife, I will only remark of her that the peculiarity of her character has thrown all the children on some one else. I do not know — I cannot by any stretch of fancy imagine — what would have become of them but for this aunt, who has grown up with them, to whom they are devoted, and who has sacrificed the best part of her youth and life to them.

She has remonstrated, reasoned, suffered, and toiled, and came again to prevent a separation between Mrs. Dickens and me. Mrs. Dickens has often expressed to her her sense of her affectionate care and devotion in the house — never more strongly than within the last twelve months.

For some years past Mrs. Dickens has been in the habit of representing to me that it would be better for her to go away and live apart; that her always increasing estrangement was due to a mental disorder under which she sometimes labors; more, that she felt herself unfit for the life she had to lead, as my wife, and that she would be better far away. I have uniformly replied that she must bear our misfortune, and fight the fight out to the end; that the children were the first consideration; and that I feared they must bind us together in "appearance."

At length, within these three weeks, it was suggested to me by Forster that, even for their sakes, it would surely be better to reconstruct and rearrange their unhappy home. I empowered him to treat with Mrs. Dickens, as the friend of both of us for one and twenty years. Mrs. Dickens wished to add, on her part, Mark Lemon, and did so. On Saturday last

Lemon wrote to Forster that Mrs. Dickens “gratefully and thankfully accepted” the terms I proposed to her. Of the pecuniary part of them I will only say that I believe they are as generous as if Mrs. Dickens were a lady of distinction and I a man of fortune. The remaining parts of them are easily described: my eldest boy to live with Mrs. Dickens and to take care of her; my eldest girl to keep my house; both my girls and all my children, but the eldest son, to live with me in the continued companionship of their aunt Georgina, for whom they have all the tenderest affection that I have ever seen among young people, and who has a higher claim (as I have often declared, for many years) upon my affection, respect, and gratitude than anybody in this world.

I hope that no one who may become acquainted with what I write here can possibly be so cruel and unjust as to put any misconstruction on our separation, so far. My elder children all understand it perfectly, and all accept it as inevitable.

There is not a shadow of doubt or concealment among us. My eldest son and I are one as to it all.

Two wicked persons, who should have spoken very differently of me, in consideration of earnest respect and gratitude, have (as I am told, and indeed to my personal knowledge) coupled with this separation the name of a young lady for whom I have a great attachment and regard. I will not repeat her name, — I honor it too much. Upon my soul and honor there is not on this earth a more virtuous and spotless creature than that young lady. I know her to be innocent and pure, and as good as my own dear daughters.

Further, I am quite sure that Mrs. Dickens, having received this assurance from me, must now believe it, in the respect I know her to have for me, and in the perfect confidence I know her in her better moments to repose in my truthfulness.

On this head, again, there is not a shadow of doubt or concealment between my children and me. All is open and plain among us, as though we were brothers and sisters. They are perfectly certain that I would not deceive them, and the confidence among us is without a fear.

C. D.

The essential wrong committed in this letter consisted not so much in its publication as in its composition. The mutual agreement between the parties to the separation proceeded on the ground that there should be no statement of the reasons for the separation. That agreement was practically broken by Dickens when he placed such a garrulous and querulous letter in the hands of Mr. Arthur Smith, to be “shown” to persons who credited the current rumors against his character. In defending himself he assails his wife. He gives the reasons why he can no longer live with her! One naturally asks for the reasons why she cannot live with Aim. There was no guilt on either side; but Mrs. Dickens, had she chosen to reply, might doubtless have shown that, as a family man, he developed qualities of temper and disposition which, from her point of view, were as repugnant to domestic happiness and harmony as any which, from his point of view, appeared to make her an unsympathetic, unsatisfactory, repellent wife. The whole matter should have rested on the original statement of “incompatibility;” but if the husband entered into details, the wife would have been justified in following his example. From Mrs. Dickens, however, proceeded no word of remonstrance and complaint; yet, by submitting to the imputations conveyed or implied in her husband’s unfortunate letter, she placed him unavoidably in a position repugnant to the feelings of a gentleman and man of honor. Without any malicious purpose, he was heedlessly impelled, by the atrocity of the libels against himself, into making explanations which injured her in public estimation; and her silence must have self convicted him, when the heat and irritation of the hour had passed away, of a violation of that sense of chivalry towards women which was as much a permanent sentiment of his heart as it was a constant inspiration of his genius. In truth, the circumstances connected with his separation from his wife exhibited Dickens in his most ungenial and unamiable mood. The same force of will which made so effective all his good qualities, both of disposition and of genius, was subject at times to strange fits of willfulness, when he became altogether unmanageable and defiant of external control, even of that control which the love, the reason, and the prudence of his nearest and dearest friends brought to bear on his headlong self-assertion. Against the admonitions of Forster, to whom he opened his heart, he persisted in pushing his domestic discontents to the point of separating from his wife; and, until the scandals arising from that act were forced on his attention, he thought the public would not trouble itself with his domestic concerns. Up to this point he had carried out his will freely; the reaction against him was terrible, but it only stimulated his combativeness; his combativeness intensified his will into self-will; and the result was the letter to Mr. Arthur

Smith, in which he forgot the rights of his wife in emphasizing his own. The whole thing is a wretched episode in Dickens's life; but we must still remember that it was an aberration of character, and not an example of its normal and healthy exercise. For years after this unfortunate event, as for years before it, Dickens showed that his character was sound at the core. He was betrayed into injustice by the perversion of qualities excellent in themselves.

CHAPTER X

IN the “Life” of Mr. Aldrich his biographer says: “Despite the pleasantness of the life at Hancock Street, the Aldriches were from the first looking about for a still more homelike shelter. Finally in December, 1866, Aldrich purchased the quaint little house 84 Pinckney Street, two thirds the way down toward the bay where the lazy Charles rests after its circuitous course through the Cambridge marshes, and gave it to Mrs. Aldrich for his remembrance on the second Christmas of their life together. They furnished it at their leisure during the winter and settled there in the spring of 1867. Of the characteristic charm of this their first home there are many records. The compact little house soon became celebrated as the happy home of a happy poet.”

It was in the autumn of this year that Boston had the great excitement of welcoming Mr. Dickens on his second visit to America. For several years Mr. Fields had been persistent in his efforts to induce Mr. Dickens to make the visit; but it was not until this time that the suggestion received any encouragement. In the early spring Mr. Dickens wrote to Mr. Fields the following letter:

“Your letter is an excessively difficult one to answer, because I really do not know that any sum of money that could be laid down would induce me to cross the Atlantic to read. Nor do I think it likely that any one on your side of the great water can be prepared to understand the state of the case. For example, I am now just finishing a series of thirty readings. The crowds attending them have been so astounding, and the relish for them has so far out-gone all previous experience, that if I were to set myself the task, ‘I will make such or such a sum of money by devoting myself to readings for a certain time,' I should have to go no further than Bond Street or Regent Street, to have it secured to me in a day. Therefore, if a specific offer and a very large one, indeed, were made to me from America, I should naturally ask myself, 'Why go through this wear and tear, merely to pluck fruit that grows on every bough at home?' It is a delightful sensation to move a new people; but I have but to go to Paris, and I find the brightest people in the world quite ready for me. I say thus much in a sort of desperate endeavor to explain myself to you. I can put no price upon fifty readings in America, because I do not know that any possible price could pay me for them. And I really cannot say to any one disposed toward the enterprise, 'Tempt me,' because I have too strong a misgiving that he cannot in the nature of things do it.

"This is the plain truth. If any distinct proposal be submitted to me I will give it a distinct answer. But the chances are a round thousand to one that the answer will be no, therefore I feel bound to make the declaration beforehand."

In the summer, however, things looked more promising; the second letter bringing more assurance:

"I am trying hard so to free myself as to be able to come over to read this next winter!"

On the 21st of August he writes: "I begin to think 'nautically' that I 'Head westward.'" And soon after that the date was set for sailing.

It was on a blustering evening in November that Mr. Dickens arrived in Boston Harbor. A few of his friends steamed down in the Custom-House boat to welcome him. It was pitch dark before the Cuba ran alongside. Mr. Dickens's cheery voice was heard welcoming Mr. Fields before there was time to distinguish him on the steamer. He looked like a bundle of animated wraps, and was in most exuberant spirits; the news of the extraordinary sale of the tickets to his readings having been carried to him by the pilot twenty miles out. Mr. Fields, having heard that a crowd had assembled in East Boston and was waiting the arrival of the steamer, decided to take his guest in the tug to Long Wharf where carriages were in waiting, and very shortly Mr. Dickens was well ensconced at the Parker House, sitting down to dinner with a half-dozen friends, quite prepared, he said, "to give the first reading in America that night if desirable."

There had been the greatest excitement over the sale of the tickets for the readings. A box office was established at Ticknor & Fields', and a rule made that only four tickets would be sold to one person. A queue was formed twenty-four hours before the sale began, and the stir and commotion for places in the line were without precedent heretofore in the city. As Mr. Aldrich was doing editorial work for Ticknor & Fields, and that house being the headquarters of literary Boston, the air was full of Dickens — we breathed it. The struggles to get the best seats, the triumph with which, after much hustling, they were secured, linger most pleasantly in my memory, especially our own little chuckles — we being behind the scenes, as it were, and sure of our places.

Boston has changed much since the days when she dined at two o'clock, asked her more formal friends to tea at six, and made the stranger within her gates the all-absorbing topic. Now we talk of balls, dinners, dances, and our literary guest closes his book and goes to the opera or the vaudeville with us.

What memories unfold themselves to my vision of that night, December 2, 1867; the night of the first appearance of Mr. Dickens in the Tremont Temple! Again I am conscious of the expectant hush as Mr. Dickens appears, book in hand, white boutonnière in buttonhole. With quick, elastic steps he takes his place. The whole audience spring to their feet, while round after round of applause, cheer after cheer, shout after shout of welcome greet him. On the stage is a simple device, designed by Mr. Dickens, looking like a reading-desk, with a light so arranged as to illuminate the reader's face; behind it stands a long, dark, purplish screen. With a magician's touch the simple desk transforms itself, supple to the master's will . — at one time a kind of pulpit with brass rail, the witness box; next the enclosed seats where the jurymen sit; then a numerous muster of gentlemen in wigs, the barristers' seats; then it became the table for Mr. Justice Stareleigh, "who put his little legs underneath it and his little three-cornered hat upon it; and when Mr. Justice Stareleigh had done this, all you could see of him was two queer little eyes, one broad pink face, and somewhere about half of a big and very comical looking wig. The officer on the floor of the court called out, 'Silence!' in a commanding tone, and the great case of Bardwell and Pickwick began," holding the listeners still and motionless until the foreman brought in the verdict of "Guilty" and fined the defendant seven hundred and fifty pounds. Then Sam Weller's father touched him on the shoulder and, with a mournful expression, said, "O, Sammy, Sammy, vy worn't there a alleybi!" With this the great audience shouted with laughter, and the wild applause began again with gathered volume, until even the walls of Tremont Temple itself seemed to echo and vibrate as a pendulum disturbed from rest and swinging to and fro.

Never to be forgotten is the accent and modulation of Mr. Dickens's voice as he spoke the words: "Marley was dead to begin with." The great audience was held in breathless silence as the ghost and Scrooge and the jocund travellers, the phantom, the spirits, went and came through the pages of the "Christmas Carol"; until little Tiny Tim observed, "God bless us, every one!" And with these words, the wonderful evening was over.

Walking home through the still wintry air, Mr. Aldrich spoke of a letter he had seen written to Professor Felton when the book was first published, showing what the writing of the book had meant to Mr. Dickens:

"In the parcel you will find a Christmas Carol in prose, being a short story of Christmas by Charles Dickens, over which Christmas Carol Charles Dickens wept and laughed and wept again, and excited himself in the most extraordinary manner in the composition, and thinking whereof he walked about the black streets of London fifteen and twenty miles many a night."

So distinct is the memory of the first time Mr. Dickens came to our house in Pinckney Street that I even see the figure in the carpet on which he stood. Mrs. Hawthorne had named this small house "Mrs. Aldrich's workbox." It was mostly composed of white muslin and pink ribbons, white muslin and blue ribbons, all excepting Mr. Aldrich's study, which Mr. Howells, to our great discomfiture, always spoke of as "Aldrich's boudoir"; as he always spoke of his own study as his workshop, our feelings were hurt and bitter. We said to each other it was nothing but sheer envy, and endeavored in this way to soothe the wound.

If the Sultan of Zanzibar, the Czar of all Russia, the Grand Mogul of India, and all the crowned heads of Europe combined should knock at our door, it would not throw the entire household into such a frenzy and flutter as that simple card did, with its magic name, "Mr. Charles Dickens."

I well remember the quick beating of my heart as I descended the stairs to the "boudoir," where I found Mr. Dickens seated in the easiest chair in the bay window. A rather short, slight figure, so he seemed to me then, without the manner that stamps the caste of "Vere de Vere." He was dressed — I think dressed is the right word — in a very light, so light that I don't know how to describe it — I can almost say soiled white color — top coat. It was wide and short, and stood out like a skirt, the collar of a much darker shade of velvet. His waistcoat was velvet of another shade of brown, with brilliant red indentations; his watch chain was buttoned into the centre button of his waistcoat, and then it divided itself. I found myself saying, "How do you do," and wondering, if the watch was in one pocket, what was at the other end of the chain in the other pocket, and was tempted to ask him the time, in the hope that he might make a mistake and bring out the other thing. I don't remember what he wore on his feet, and I don't know the plaid of his trousers, but I rather think it was a black-and-white check — what the Englishman calls "pepper and salt." I don't remember any one topic of conversation on that first visit, but I remember well the laughter and good cheer; the charming way in which the guest made these two young people feel that to him they really were persons of consequence and were so regarded by this prince of strangers who tarried within their gates.

On our first Thanksgiving in this box of a house, Mr. Fields by chance came in. It was a cold day and snowing, which made the house, in contrast to the "biting and nipping air" outside, seem more gay and cheerful with the open fires, flowers, and the table set for dinner with the wedding presents of silver and glass. Mr. Fields said, "Oh, Dickens has got to come and see this!" So off he went to bring him.

In those happy days my mainstay and dependence was an austere lady who consented to live with us for the modest sum of five dollars per week, which would include the services of herself and daughter. It is true that this daughter had lived in this great world of ours but six years; but Mrs. Sterling felt that Lizzie was a sufficient grown-up to answer the doorbell, wait at the table, and, as Mrs. Sterling said, "serve it all," if she, Mrs. Sterling, "waited in the pantry to lift the heavy dishes to and fro from the table." Lizzie was also an accomplished duster, and could run up and down stairs on all kinds of errands, and also knew cause and effect, as I remember her assuring me one day, when the fire bells rang, "that she supposed some one had been fiddling with kerosene."

Added to all these accomplishments, Lizzie was a composite portrait of all the old Dutch masters, in her mouse-colored dress reaching almost to the ground; a long white tire with full bishop sleeves, hair braided on each side of her brow, and tied with the same mouse-colored ribbon in a prim bow.

Mr. Fields soon returned with his distinguished guest, who was, I remember, to dine with Mr. Longfellow that day. After a pleasant chat in the library, Mr. Dickens turned to me saying, "Now I want to see the little maid.

I have heard all about her.” So I went on the quest; and soon the demure little Dutch picture walked in with her silver tray, decanter, and wine-glass. Going up to Mr. Dickens she said, with her alluring lisp, “If you please, sir, will you take a glass of wine and a biscuit?” Mr. Dickens poured out his glass of wine, and with a courtly bow to us, and a lower one to the little maid, drank to our health and happiness; and when the little maid departed put his head on the cushion of his chair and laughed and laughed. Then turning to me he said, “Now I want to see this wonderful house from top to bottom, from cellar to attic.” We showed it to him with honest and possessive pride, and when his visit was over he said, in leaving, that nothing in our country had interested him more. We have wondered since if, in telling of his visit to others, he did not say that nothing in our country had amused him more.

The next play on our happy stage of life was the “walking match” and the dinner Mr. Dickens gave to the victorious champion.

Mr. Fields says, in his “Yesterdays with Authors,” that it was in Baltimore that Mr. Dickens conceived his idea of a walking match between Mr. Osgood and Mr. Dolby, and that he went into this matter with as much earnest directness as if he were planning a new novel.

The articles of this joyous joke were drawn up and sent to the house of Ticknor & Fields with as much circumstance and official dignity as if they were papers relating to the making of a new president.

When this great international battle was over, and America had won, came the brilliant dinner at the Parker House.¹ Impressed on my memory for all time will be the picture of that night: a long table with its beautiful arrangement of flowers arranged by Mr. Dickens himself, and so designed that at the end of the feast they easily disintegrated, giving each woman a lovely bouquet de corsage. The dinner place cards were an innovation new to Boston. Mine was a gay little colored picture of a table laid for two, and the bridegroom (for I am sure it was a bridal party) with uplifted glass drinking a benediction to his bride.

There were no set speeches that night, as indeed there need not be with that company; such wit and laughter that made even the sparkle of the champagne seem dull and lifeless. The host at the head of his table was the incarnation of joy on a cruise of pleasure. Every fibre of his body was unrestrained and alert with good-fellowship, so that even the youngest and shyest guest, who “had nothing to contribute to such a company but her youth and appreciation, forgot to be self-conscious.

1 “Distinguished Company.

“Charles Dickens to preside and James T. Fields to be seated opposite. Mrs. Annie Fields, Charles Eliot Norton and Mrs. Norton, Prof. James Russell Lowell and Mrs. Lowell, Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes and Mrs. Holmes, Mr. Howard Malcolm Ticknor and Mrs. Ticknor, Mr. Aldrich and Mrs. Aldrich, Mr. Schlesinger, and an obscure poet named Longfellow (if discoverable) and Miss Longfellow.”

A few weeks after the memorable visit of Mr. Dickens, the composite little Dutch picture appeared in the “boudoir” bringing with her a tiny silver tray on which lay a visiting card, “Mr. Henry W. Longfellow.” The lisping voice made haste to say, “I said the Master and Mistress was home. I asked him into the dining-room and I told him to set down.”

Mr. Longfellow at this time had passed his sixtieth birthday. The awful chasm which, without the slightest warning, had opened at his feet in the tragedy of his wife’s death had made him look much older than his years could count. Time never assuaged the wound of that bereavement. He spoke or wrote of it only in the fewest words. Once in writing to Mr. Curtis he said, “I am utterly wretched and overwhelmed; to the eyes of others outwardly calm, but inwardly bleeding to death.” The spiritual beauty of Mr. Longfellow’s expression, the dignity and gentleness of his manner, his smile of peculiar sweetness, all had great charm, and made him seem the ideal poet.

The distinguished guest was soon placed in the easiest chair in the study, his hostess vainly endeavoring to appear at ease, and to hide as much as possible her sense of the high honor paid by this visit, which to her was much the same as it would be to the English subject should the King, without retinue or warning, depart from his palace to visit a simple gentry of his kingdom. After a half-hour’s friendly chat of books and men, Mr. Longfellow said: “May I tell you how I am impressed with the atmosphere of home and cheer you have given to this little room? Its crimson walls, the flowers, the crowded shelves of books, all tell their story of the fortunate, the happy day, when a new household found its place among the innumerable homes of earth.” Then, turning to his hostess, he said: “I should so much like if you would show me all of this small house. Mr. Dickens told me of its charm." With shy pride we took our guest from room to room, and when we came to our bedroom with its blue chintz hangings Mr. Longfellow said that all the bluebirds printed on them should know it was a poet's home and sing to him their sweetest melodies both day and night.

When the short tour of the house was over, lingering a moment at the dining-room door Mr. Longfellow said: "Ah, Mr. Aldrich, it will not always be

I hear in the chamber above me,
The patter of little feet,
The sound of a door that is opened,
And voices soft and sweet.

the same round table for two. By and by it will extend itself, and about it will cluster little faces, royal guests, drumming on the table with their spoons. And then, as the years go by, one by one they will take flight to build nests of their own. The round table will again recede until it is set for two and you and Mrs. Aldrich will be alone. This is the story of life, the pathetic poem of the fireside. Make an idyl of it; I give the idea to you." Mr. Aldrich did not use the motif, and Mr. Longfellow himself later wrote the poem "The Hanging of the Crane," for which poem Mr. Bonner paid him three thousand dollars for the right to publish it in his paper. Thus the little visit, which Mr. Longfellow in his kindness made, brought for him a dual reward — money and fame, and a larger asset, the pleasure and matronly pride it gave its young recipient.

This visit was soon followed by an invitation to dine at Craigie House. As our carriage stopped at the gate our host appeared at the open door, and coming down the long walk with courtly grace gave his arm to his young guest. The picture of the scene is indelible: the tender grace of the dying day; the lilacs just in bloom; the green of the grass; and a poet, bareheaded, with whitening hair, standing in the twilight.

VII.
CHARLES DICKENS

It was my privilege, many years ago, to clasp the hand of Charles Dickens and to hear from his lips the cordial assurance of his personal regard. "If you come to England," he said, "be sure to come to me; and it won't be my fault if you don't have a good time." The great novelist said those words as we sat together aboard a little tug-boat, on the morning of April 22, 1868, steaming to the Russia, which was anchored in the bay of New York, and about to sail for England. It was a lovely morning. The air was genial, the broad expanse of the Hudson and the bay sparkled in brilliant sunlight, and the whole silver scene was vital with motion and cheerful sound. Dickens had expressed the wish to slip away unimpeded by a crowd, for his many Readings, together with much travel and continuous social exertion, had taxed his endurance, and he was weary and ill. Accordingly, accompanied by his friend and manager, George Dolby, he drove from his hotel, the Westminster, to the pier at the western end of Spring Street, where a few friends were to meet him and embark with him for the steamship. The party included James T. Fields, James R. Osgood, Sol Eytinge, Jr., A. V. S. Anthony, H. C. Jarrett, H. D. Palmer, George Dolby, and the present writer, — who is the sole survivor of that group. When Dickens alighted from the carriage and glanced at the river he uttered the joyous exclamation: "That's home!" We were soon aboard the tugboat, — called "The Only Son," — and as we sailed down the river it pleased the novelist to talk with me about many things. I had heard all his Readings in New York, and had written about them, and on that subject he had many pleasant words to say. Mention being made of the English poet Matthew Arnold, he spoke warmly, saying: "He is one of the gentlest and most earnest of men." Of the renowned foreign actor Charles Fechter, — who had not visited America, but was soon to come, — he said: "When you see Fechter you will, I think, recognize a great artist." So the talk rambled on, till presently I ventured to speak of the benefit and comfort that I, in common with thousands of other readers, had derived from his novels. My favorite, in those days, was "A Tale of Two Cities," and in a fervor of enthusiasm I declared to him the opinion that it is the greatest of his works. He seemed much pleased, and he answered, with evident conviction: "I think so too!" Study and thought, in years that since have passed, convince me that we were both somewhat mistaken, for the indisputable supremacy of Dickens is that of the humorist, and surely the foremost of his novels, in respect of humor, are "David Copperfield" and "Martin Chuzzlewit"; but the avowal he then made affords an interesting glimpse of his mind, and therefore it is worthy to be remembered.

The humorist not infrequently undervalues his special gift, and fancies himself to be stronger in pathos than in mirth. Dickens, as shown by many denotements in his writings, was fond of melodrama, meaning the drama of astonishing situations, — a branch of art by no means to be despised, but not the highest, — and he liked positive, literal effects rather than suggestions to the imagination: it is known, for example, that he ranked the performance of Solon Shingle, by John E. Owens, which was reality, above the performance of Rip Van Winkle, by Joseph Jefferson, which, in that actor's treatment of it, was poetry. No critical considerations, however, affected our discourse, in the conversation that is now recalled. The novelist had labored through a toilsome season: his work was done, his mind was at ease, and he was blithe in spirits, — only subdued, at moments, by consciousness of impending separation from dear friends. There was about him the irresistible charm of ingenuous demeanor and absolute simplicity. His appearance, that day, afforded a striking contrast with the appearance he had presented at the reading desk. When before an audience Dickens assumed the pose of an actor. He wore evening dress, but he used the accessories of footlights and also a colored screen as a background, and he "made up" his face, as actors do. There was, in his reading, an extraordinary facility of impersonation, and he employed all essential means to heighten the desired effect of it. Now he was himself. The actor had disappeared. The man was with us, unsophisticated and unadorned. He wore a rough travelling suit and a soft felt hat; his right foot was wrapped in black silk, for he had been suffering from gout; and he carried a plain stick. After he had boarded the steamship, and while he was talking with the captain and other officers, the members of our little party assembled in the saloon with what he afterward jocosely described as “bitter beer intentions.” Soon he approached our group and, addressing me, he said: “What are you drinking?” I named the fluid, and, responding to his request, filled a tumbler for him. He shook hands with us, all around, with a grasp of iron, emptied his glass, put it on the table, and turned to greet the old statesman Thurlow Weed, who had just then arrived: whereupon, immediately, I seized that glass, and, to the consternation of the attendant steward, put it into my pocket, — mentioning, as I did so, Sir Walter Scott’s appropriation of the glass of King George IV, at the civic feast in Edinburgh, long ago. The royal souvenir, it is recorded, fared ill, for Sir Walter sat upon it and broke it. The Dickens souvenir survives and is still in my possession. When the farewells had been spoken and we had left the ship, Dickens stood at the rail, his brilliant eyes (and surely no eyes more brilliant were ever seen) suffused with tears, and, placing his hat on the end of his stick, he waved it to us till distance had hidden him from view. I never saw him again. Nine years later, in 1877, when I first went to England, though I could not seek for him at his home, I stood with reverence beside his grave. He rests in the Poets’ Corner of Westminster Abbey. As I drew near to that sacred spot I saw a single red rose lying on the pavement that bears his name, and almost at the instant a heedless visitor, indolently strolling along the transept, trod upon the flower and crushed it.

The general heart of mankind was touched by Charles Dickens. Criticism, in its examination of his writings, may refine and discriminate to the utmost possible extent, but it cannot obliterate that solid, decisive truth. His own words tersely and convincingly declare the consummate, conquering principles of his faith and his works:

Ages of incessant labor, by immortal creatures, for this earth, must pass into eternity, before the good of which it is susceptible is all developed. . . . Any Christian spirit, working kindly in its little sphere, whatever it may be, will find its mortal life too short for its vast means of usefulness. . . . There is nothing in the world so inevitably contagious as laughter and good humor.

Upon those principles Dickens continuously acted, and in his literary life, of more than thirty years of conscientious labor, he created enduring works of art, — peopling the realm of pure fiction with a wide variety of characters, interpreting human nature in manifold phases, reflecting the passing hour, demolishing social abuses, teaching the sacred duty of charity, comforting and helping the poor, and stretching forth the hands of loving sympathy to the outcast and the wretched. Thus laboring, he enriched the world with a perpetual spring of kindness, of hope, and of innocent, happy laughter; he inculcated devotion to noble ideals; and he stimulated and strengthened the spiritual instincts of the human race. Any relic of such a man is precious, and the Dickens souvenir to which I have adverted, — the glass from which he took his parting drink, on the day of his final departure from America, — has been tenderly cherished. Once in a while it is brought forth and shown, for the pleasure of a literary visitor. On one occasion of exceptional and peculiar interest, when Charles Dickens, the younger, dined with us in our home, March 3, 1883, it was placed in his hands, and thus, after the lapse of fifteen years, the farewell glass of the illustrious father was touched by the lips of the reverent and honored son.

The younger Charles Dickens, a man of uncommon talents and of a singularly amiable and winning personality, possessed abundant and deeply interesting recollections of his father, and, naturally, he was fond of talking about him. Adverting to his father's Readings, he mentioned several picturesque and significant incidents, all tending to show the deep interest that the great novelist felt in that branch of his art, and the scrupulous care with which he trained himself for the vocation of public reader. The home of Dickens, Gad's Hill Place, a house that he had known and fancied when a boy, and that he bought in 1856, is near to Rochester and Chatham, where there is a military and naval establishment. "Noisy brawls sometimes occurred in the neighborhood," said the younger Dickens, "but we did not regard them. One morning I heard a great din, shouts and screams, as of a violent, drunken quarrel. At first I did not heed it, but after a while, as it steadily continued, I went out to our grove, across the road, where I found my father, alone. 'Have you heard the row?' I asked. 'Did you hear any noise?' he answered. 'Yes,' I replied, 'I thought somebody was being killed. What can have happened? Did you shout?' 'I made the row,' he replied; 'I have been rehearsing the murder scene in "Oliver Twist.'" It was the wrangle of Bill Sykes and Nancy that you heard; I have just been trying to kill Nancy.' 'Well,' I said, 'I should think you have succeeded, for a more damnable racket was never made.'" The earnest narrator proceeded to tell me that his father was warned against the prodigious exertion necessitated by those Readings of his, and especially by the reading from "Oliver Twist." The death of Dickens (aged only fifty-eight) was precipitated by his implication in a frightful railroad accident, which occurred at Staplehurst, a year before he died, but, undoubtedly, the efforts that he made as a public reader hastened the close of his great career. Indeed, toward the last, his son

Charles, acting in obedience to the imperative order of his father's doctor, invariably sat in front, near to the stage, and, — as he told me, — had, privately, provided himself with a short ladder, by means of which he could obtain immediate access to the platform, in order to aid his father in case he should be smitten with a stroke of apoplexy. Such an end was expected, and such was the end that came; but, happily, not in public. Dickens gave his last reading on March 19, 1869, at St. James's Hall, London. He died, suddenly, of apoplexy, in his dining room at Gad's Hill Place, June 9, 1870. The younger Charles Dickens long survived his father, dying on July 21, 1896, — and so one of the kindest men, one of the gentlest spirits, one of the best speakers in England, vanished from our mortal scene.

The name of the Dickens house and of its locality is spelled both ways — Gad's Hill and Gadshill. In the second act of the First Part of Shakespeare's great play of "Henry IV" it is spelled Gadshill, and it is used as the name of a place and as the name of a person, — the servant of Falstaff. The place is westward from Rochester. On a brilliant day in the summer of 1885 I made a pilgrimage to that literary shrine, — driving from the Bull, at Rochester, Mr. Pickwick's tavern, and passing many hours among the haunts of Dickens. There is, or was, a quaint little inn, called the Falstaff, near to Gad's Hill Place, on the opposite side of the turnpike road, and from that resort I dispatched a card to the owner of the mansion, Major , signifying that one of the American friends of Dickens would gratefully appreciate the privilege of viewing the house. The Major received me with cordial hospitality, and so it happened that a stranger spoke, upon the threshold of Dickens, the welcome that the great author himself intended and promised to speak. There was the study, unchanged, — the room in which "Great Expectations," "Our Mutual Friend" and "Edwin Drood" were written; there was the writing-desk at which the magician would never sit again; there was the vacant chair; there, on the back of the door, was the painted book-case, with the mock volumes, bearing comic titles, invented by the novelist; and over all the golden summer sunshine glimmered and a magic light of memory that words are powerless to paint. I sat in the chair of Charles Dickens and reverently wrote my name in the chronicle of pilgrims to his earthly home. The dining room had, on that day, been prepared for a banquet for many persons, but no guests had yet arrived, and the Major kindly permitted me to enter it and see the sofa on which Dickens died; and later he conducted me through a tunnel underneath the road, giving access to a field and grove where was the Swiss chalet presented to Dickens by friends of his in Switzerland, a snug retreat to which he often resorted to escape interruption when at work, and where he passed his last day as a living man. I recalled his words, as I stood there: "If you come to England be sure to come to me" and it seemed to me that he was actually present, and that I felt again the hearty grasp of his hand and heard the ringing tones of his cheery voice. The garden was gay with red roses. "Dickens loved these," said the Major, and, so saying, he placed a cluster of them in my hands, by way of gracious farewell.

THE READINGS OF DICKENS

Dickens was not only an excellent reader but a good actor. The discerning reader of his novels perceives that he possessed a keen dramatic instinct. The auditor of his Readings was soon convinced that he also possessed a positive dramatic faculty. In reading scenes from his novels he entered into characters that he had created, and his correct assumption of diverse personalities was decisively effective. Now he was Scrooge; presently Mr. Fizgig; then Bob Cratchitt; and by and by he passed, easily, by the expedient of artistic suggestion, — and by something more, which it is difficult to define, — through the contrasted guises of Serjeant Buzfuz, the little Judge, Mrs. Cluppins, Sam Weller, Mr. Winkle, Micawber, Pecksniff, and Sairey Gamp. The skill that merges personality with a fictitious character, and yet does not efface the performer's individual quality, is indispensable in acting. Dickens possessed it. He knew the effect that he wished to produce. His method was characterized by simplicity and delicacy. In the copious, mellow, musical vocalism (a little marred by the monotony of rising inflection), the authoritative manner, the unaffected, free gesticulation, and the spontaneous accordance of the action with the word the authentic art of the actor was conspicuous. As an interpreter of tragic character and feeling he was consistent and often impressive, as in his reading of the storm chapter, much condensed, in "David Copperfield," — that wonderful blending of the terrors of the tempest with the tragic and pathetic culminations of human fate, — but he was, distinctively, a humorist, and his humorous embodiments, for embodiments, practically, they were, and not merely denotements, were his indubitable triumphs of dramatic art. In outbursts of passionate emotion, while he did not lack fervor, he lacked vocal power; but the moment he entered the realm of humor he was a monarch. His whole being then seemed aroused. His clear, brilliant, expressive eyes twinkled with joy; his countenance expressed bubbling mirth that was with difficulty restrained; his tones grew deep and rich; he, manifestly, escaped from all consciousness of self; and he completely captivated his auditor.

At this distance of time, — forty years having passed since last I heard his voice, — it is not easy to name his superlative comic achievements; but my clearest remembrance of them would specify Micawber, Mrs. Gamp, Sam Wetter, Mrs. Raddles, Pecksniff, Mrs. Gummidge and the little servant of Bob Sawyer as gems of his humorous acting. There was a sweet, gentle strain of humor in his exposition of the delicate episode of poor little Dora Spenlow; but the scenes in which he revelled and greatly excelled were such as display the festival with Micawber at Canterbury; the supper with Bob Sawyer, in the lodging-house of the shrill, spiteful Mrs. Raddles; and the tipsy altercation between Mrs. Gamp and Mrs. Prig. His finest impersonations, — finest, because of the dramatic interpreter's absolute fidelity to the author's designs, and also because of their integral revealment of his genius, — were, as I remember them, those of Dr. Marigold and Mrs. Gamp. The latter portrayal was a consummate type of his humor; the former of his pathos. That fat, fussy heathen, that prodigy of eccentric, comic selfishness, that ungainly, sagacious, piggish cockney, Mrs. Gamp, — herself possessing no perception, however slight, of either good feeling or mirth, — delights by the grotesque comicality of a character, both serious and ludicrous, which is skilfully developed and displayed under ingeniously humorous conditions. All lovers of broad fun have rejoiced in Sairey, — in her copious loquacity, her store of anecdote, her appropriate aphorisms, her belief in the utility of regular habits, her talent for sarcasm, her partiality for gin, her naive suggestion of “a bottle on the chimbley-piece, to set to my lips when so disposed,” her ample resources of unconsciously ludicrous illustration, her fecund, inexhaustible vocabulary, her mythical friend Mrs. Harris, her formidable compatriot Betsy Prig, and her ever memorable quarrel with that audacious associate. Dickens must have rejoiced in creating Mrs. Gamp, for he evinced the keenest artistic enjoyment in depicting her, — his portrayal of her exemplifying absolute harmony between the imaginative ideal and the executive intellectual purpose. Our stage was adorned, in old times, by three comedians, George Holland, William Davidge, and Marie Wilkins, any of whom could have personated Mrs. Gamp perfectly well; but none of them, though aided by the accessories of costume and scenery, could have made the character more actual to the material vision than Dickens made it to the eyes of the mind. He read it, and, at the same time, he contrived to act it.

The same felicity of achievement was perceptible in the portrayal of Dr. Marigold. No other one of his Readings contained more — if so much — of himself. In whatsoever way interpreted, the story of Dr. Marigold would touch the heart. As interpreted by Dickens, its harmony of humor and pathos was irresistible. The sketch itself is exceptionally representative of the essential characteristic of its author's genius — vital humanity. No writer has shown himself more capable than Dickens was of pointing those afflicting contrasts which reveal human nature as, at times, so noble, and social conditions as, at times, so tragic. No writer ever was more quick to see or more expert to show, the heart that beats beneath the motley, and, therewithal, the masquerade of living, in which so many human beings, of fine feeling and high motive, are doomed to participate, — often through many arid years of smiling endurance. When Dickens assumed Dr. Marigold the formal English gentleman, in evening dress, seemed to disappear, while in his place stood the coarsely clad, loquacious pedler, on the footboard of his Cheap-Jack cart, — his dying daughter clasped to his breast, her arms around his neck, her head drooping on his shoulder, — vending his wares — voluble, facetious, resolute — hiding his sorrow — the veritable incarnation of heroism — even while the gray shadow of death was stealing over the face of his child. It was an inexpressibly pathetic presentment of dramatic contrast: on one side, self-abnegation, the celestial element of human nature; on the other side, innocent, helpless, forlorn childhood, made doubly sacred by misfortune. I have seen all the important acting that has been shown on the American stage within a past of more than fifty years: I have seen but little, in the serio-comic vein, that was better than that of Charles Dickens in the character of Dr. Marigold. This humble tribute can suggest only the general character of his art. His Readings were the spontaneous expression, wisely guided, of a great nature, in the maturity of its greatness, and those persons who heard them enjoyed a precious privilege, never to be forgotten.

Contemporary interest in those Readings, no doubt, was intensified by admiration, — then very general, — of the reader's writings; and perhaps, by reason of that admiration, they seem, in remembrance, to have been finer than they actually were. I do not, however, credit that conjecture. I recall, even now, the action of Dickens when, as Bob Cratchitt, he seemed to be throwing a kiss to Tiny Tim, and brushing away a tear, as he prepared to propose the health of Scrooge. Those persons only who have children and fear to lose them, or, loving them, have lost them, could understand how much that simple action meant. I recall his sad tones and direct way when, as Pegotty, he told of the weary search for Little Em'ly, and "the fine, massive grandeur in his face" when he spoke those touching words: "And only God knows how good them mothers was to me." I remember the exalted, awe-stricken expression of his countenance when, as he closed his narrative of the storm, in "Copperfield," he spoke of the dead man, whose name is unmentioned, and the pathetic tone in which he said: "I saw him lying with his head upon his arm, as I had often seen him lie at school." Those indescribably beautiful strokes of art, and many like them, denoted a consummate artist. It is not, however, to be questioned that the intrinsic power and authentic supremacy of Dickens consisted in authorship, and not in the histrionic illustration of it. He enriched literature with creations that can never perish. Humor and pathos blend in his works and make an exquisite music. The geniality of Christmas is nowhere so fully expressed as in "Pickwick" and the "Carol," — where great fires blaze upon spacious hearths, and bright eyes sparkle, and merry bells ring, and sunshine, starlight, and joy make a delicious atmosphere of comfort, kindness, and ardent good-will. There is no terror more ghastly than that on the face of Jonas Chuzzlewit, as he breaks out of the woods, after doing the murder. There is no written tempest more actual and terrible than the tempest in which Ham and Steerforth go to their death. There is no emblem of self-sacrifice more sublime than the figure of Sidney Carton at the guillotine. But it is only a glimpse of a great author that is here intended, — not a critical estimate of works long since accepted into the sacrarium of English Literature. The world knows them by heart, and the judgment of the most exacting of human intellect has recognized and celebrated the scope and the opulence of their writer's genius: the vitality of his thought; the sincerity of his virtuous emotion; the certainty of his intuition; the felicity of his inventive skill; the rosy glow of his copious, captivating humor; the fineness of his perception of tragic and comic contrast in human experience; the depth of his sympathy with the common joys and sorrows of the human race; the eloquence of his fluent, nervous, forcible, convincing style; and the profound, steadfast, consistent purpose of his life and his art to inculcate the religion of charity and love. The world is happier and better because Charles Dickens has lived in it.

DICKENSIA

Impromptu

From Bentley's Miscellany, Volume One, No.2 March, 1837 p.297

By C.J. Davids

Who the dickens “Boz” could be
Puzzled many a learned elf;
Till time unveil’d the mystery,
And Boz appear’d as DICKENS’ self!

Poetical Epistle from Father Prout to Boz

From Bentley's Miscellany, Volume Three, No.1 January 1838 p.71

I.

A RHYME! a rhyme! from a distant clime, — from the gulph of the Genoese:

O'er the rugged scalps of the Julian Alps, dear Boz! I send you these,
To light the Wick your candlestick holds up, or, should you list,
To usher in the yarn you spin concerning. Oliver Twist.

II.

Immense applause you've gained, oh, Boz! through continental Europe;
You'll make Pickwick oecumenick; of fame you have a sure hope:
For here your books are found, gadzooks! in greater luxe than any
That have issued yet, hotpress'd or wet, from the types of GALIGNANI.

III.

But neither when you sport your pen, oh, potent mirth-compeller!
Winning our hearts "in monthly parts," can Pickwick or Sam Weller
Cause us to weep with pathos deep, or shake with laugh spasmodical,
As when you drain your copious vein for Bentley's periodical.

IV.

Folks all enjoy your Parish Boy, — so truly you depict him;
But I, alack! while thus you track your stinted poor-law's victim,
Must think of some poor nearer home, — poor who, unheeded, perish,
By squires despoiled, by "patriots" gulled, — I mean the starving Irish.

V.

Yet there's no dearth of Irish mirth, which, to a mind of feeling,
Seemeth to be the Helot's glee before the Spartan reeling:
Such gloomy thought o'ercometh not the glow of England's humour,
Thrice happy isle! long may the smile of genuine joy illumine her!

VI.

Write on, young sage! still o'er the page pour forth the flood of fancy;
Wax still more droll, wave o'er the soul Wit's wand of necromancy.
Behold! e'en now around your brow th' immortal laurel thickens;

Yea, SWIFT or STERNE might gladly learn a thing or two from DICKENS.

VII.

A rhyme! a rhyme! from a distant clime, — a song from the sunny south!

A goodly theme, so Boz but deem the measure not uncouth.
Would, for thy sake, that “PROUT” could make his bow in fashion finer, “Partant” (from thee) “pour la Syrie,” for Greece and Asia Minor.

Genoa, 14th December 1837.

To C. Dickens, Esq.

From: The Regrets of Memory, a poem, with minor poems, translations, etc., Anonymous, Henry Wix, 1840, p.85-86

ALL hail, O Boz! — the magic of whose name
Frees us at once from devils blue, and vapours,
E'en Envy's self cannot deny the fame
Thou'st gain'd from thy immortal Pickwick Papers.

And where is now that gallant hero? Where Poetic Snodgrass? Winkle, rich and racy?
Tupman, whose thoughts are ever with the fair,
Tupman — rejoicing in the name of Tracy?

All other written characters survive
But in the monuments which art employs;
Thy living portraits shall for ever live,
In Pickwicks — Tupmans — Winkles — and fat boys.

To Charles Dickens on His Proposed Voyage to America, 1842

From: The New Monthly Magazine, February 1842, p.217

By Thomas Hood

PSHAW! Away with leaf and berry,
And the sober-sided cup!
Bring a Goblet and bright Sherry!
And a bumper fill me up —
Tho' I had a pledge to shiver,
And the largest ever was, —
Ere his vessel leaves our river,
I will drink a health to "Boz"!

Here's success to all his antics,
Since it pleases him to roam,
And to paddle o'er Atlantics,
After such a sale at home!
May he shun all rocks whatever,
And the shallow sand that lurks, —
And his Passage be as clever
As the best among his works!

BOZ IN MINIATURE

Or Small Change for the “American Notes”, Coined By Alfred Jingle.

From: The Dublin Monthly Magazine, December 1842 p.354-356

“Mr. Pickwick — Well, Sam, how do you like this country?

Sam Weller — Vy, I admires it — as much as I can — as the connoisseur expressed hisself ven the old gemman showed him the shocking bad pickter.” — Slick’s Recollections of Pickwick:

I.

Never shall I forget how much I wondered
When first the Steamer’s state room met my eyes.
On which my wife and I so long had pondered;
But now its smallness filled us with surprise;
We saw, indeed, that we had greatly blundered,
Making our luggage of so large a size:
Sore was the joke, but we were patient under it,
Reflecting that experience makes one wise.

II.

The Stewardess told us all would be so pleasant, —
(God bless the woman for her well-meant lies!)
That children absent were as near as present,
And well she knew no wicked winds would rise.
But soon our party thought of being sea-sick
With ominous fears, though nothing yet was said;
At length we all gave up, and some took physic,
Some took roast pig, and others went to bed.

III.

As for our passage, it was somewhat stormy,

For in ten days a heavy gale came on,
And all the things above, behind, before me
Were turned, in one short moment, upside down.
Oh! that dark night amid the wild Atlantic!
Only a dream can image it again,
And each strange untie, which the ship, grown frantic,
Played with the waves, her victory to gain!

IV.

At length it chanced that we were nearly lost on
The rocks near Halifax, I scarce know how,
But we got off, and soon arrived at Boston,
Where from the shore we felt a sharp wind blow
Well may the stranger praise this beauteous city,
Which looks as if intended for a show;
The houses seem as slight, and bright, and pretty
As children's toys, which in a box they stow.

V.

Great good is done in this place by the College, (Far more than by some others I have known,
Which set up silly prejudice for knowledge,
And recognize no world beyond their own;)
The ladies here are very lovely creatures,
Although their forms are miserably thin; —
Much time they spend in running after preachers,
Who make them think that mirth is mortal sin.

VI.

New York appeared more mercantile than Boston,
Though like it in its dinners, and its lunches;
Their business every one appeared engrossed in,
And so no Organs cheer the streets, or Punches.
The ladies here are singularly pretty,

And fond of gaudy dress beyond belief. —
Pigs are the scavengers of this great city,
(And hence the pork brought in by Peel's tariff.)

VII.

To Philadelphia I must give my praises —
There by the regular streets I was confused,
And the good folk had some pedantic phrases,
To show their taste, by which I was amused. —
To Washington I went, and there they asked me
“What struck me in the Legislator's heads?”
So (looking sharp at them when thus they tasked me)
I saw that all their cheeks were stuffed with quids.

VIII.

On to the South and West we now proceeded,
With much to praise, and little to reproach;
The bruises that we got we scarcely heeded,
While tumbling on in many a clumsy coach.
The scenery seemed to me not very ugly,
With all its stunted trees half hid in swamp,
With nothing neatly trimmed, or settled snugly.
And ev'n the houses looking new and damp.

IX.

Our inconveniences were few in number, —
We missed the cleansing element indeed;
Hard were th' uncurtained beds, forbidding slumber,
And foul the use of the Virginian weed!
The roads were nought but swamps and pits of gravel —
The river — one great ditch of liquid mud;
Yet there was much in all our modes of travel
Which gave me great delight and did me good!

X.

Oft as I saw the slimy waters creep by,
 How far away did my departure seem!
Oh! never may I see that Mississippi,
 Save in the visions of some hideous dream!
To cheer one's spirits vain was the endeavour,
 At formal meals where not a soul would speak;
Ev'n now the cold remembrance makes me shiver,
 Of that dark spell I had no power to break!

XI.

At length how gladly did I leave for ever
 All I had been at so much pains to seek —
The deadly river, spreading round it fever,
 The Steamers which blow up — two every week —
The vast and dull Prairie, where scarce a tree grows,
(A dreary sight, enough to make one mope,)
 And, worse than all, the slavery of the Negroes,
That cruel knavery which no power can stop.

XII.

Our hardships still were frightful beyond measure,
 As on we jolted 'mid the stunted logs;
Yet often now do I recall with pleasure
 Our weary journey through the woods and bogs.
And oft as I enjoy myself at leisure,
 Amid my comforts, sitting at my ease,
How fondly does my faithful memory treasure
 Locations dear to me beyond the seas!

XIII.

Niagara, however, gave me Rapture,
 Far more than aught which elsewhere I had seen;

The Feelings that I felt would fill a Chapter,
So Grand they were, yet Peaceful and Serene. —
With Spray to blind me, and the noise to stun me,
I missed at first the Vastness of the Scene,
But soon Sublime Sensations came upon me —
Great Heavens! what mighty Waters Bright and Green!

XIV.

On Lake Champlain the Steamer that I sailed in
Was ev'n more exquisite than those at home,
Nothing (that London travell'rs want) it failed in.
And upon deck we sat, like some neat room —
All I had seen in Canada was decent;
“All right,” is there the word, not “go a-head;”
I own I felt the contrast very pleasant, Though these are thoughts which should not be betrayed.

XV.

And now we gazed on scenes indeed romantic,
Whose pictures by no common hand are traced;
Far famed they are on both sides of th' Atlantic,
And fresh they live on every mind impressed —
The Kaatskill mountains, and the Sleepy Hollow,
The Tappaan Zee, we softly glided past;
And glad we were that nothing more should follow,
But that on scenes like these we looked the last!

XVI.

Thus to New York in happy mood returning,
We made our preparations to depart,
And to our friends we spoke that word of mourning,
Which all through life must cut the tender heart!
Still, when we thought about our nest and chickens,

Our nice clean floors, and sleep-inviting beds,
We said, “as surely as our name is D-ck-ns,
We’ll never visit more the Land of Quids.”

A Tribute to Charles Dickens

From: Albert Schloss's "English Bijou Almanack" for 1842

By the Hon. Mrs. Norton

“Not merely thine the tribute praise,
Which greets an author's progress here;
Not merely thine the fabled bays,
Whose verdure brightens his career;
Thine the pure triumph to have taught
Thy brother man a gentle part;
In every ling a fervent thought,
Which gushes from thy generous heart:
For thine are words which rouse up all
The dormant good among us found —
Like drops which from a fountain fall,
To bless and fertilize the ground I”

Song Written for the Dinner Given to Charles Dickens by the Young Men of Boston, Feb. 1 1842

From: Poems, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Hurst and Company, N.D. p.130-131

By Oliver Wendell Holmes

The stars their early vigils keep,
The silent hours are near,
When drooping eyes forget to weep, —
Yet still we linger here;
And what — the passing churl may ask —
Can claim such wondrous power,
That Toil forgets his wonted task,
And Love his promised hour?

The Irish harp no longer thrills,
Or breathes a fainter tone;
The clarion blast from Scotland's hills,
Alas! no more is blown;
And Passion's burning lip bewails
Her Harold's wasted fire,
Still lingering o'er the dust that veils
The Lord of England's lyre.

But grieve not o'er its broken strings,
Nor think its soul hath died,
While yet the lark at heaven's gate sings,
As once o'er Avon's side;
While gentle summer sheds her bloom.
And dewy blossoms wave,
Alike o'er Juliet's storied tomb

And Nelly's nameless grave.

Thou glorious island of the sea!
Though wide the wasting flood
That parts our distant land from thee,
We claim thy generous blood;
Nor o'er thy far horizon springs
One hallowed star of fame,
But kindles, like an angel's wings,
Our western skies in flame!

To Charles Dickens on his “Christmas Carol”

From: The Illuminated Magazine, February 1844, p.189

By W.W.G.

Honour to Genius! When its lofty speech
Stirs through the soul, and wakes its echoing strings:
But honour tenfold! When its day-words reach
The selfish heart, and there let loose the springs

Of pity, gushing blood-warm from a breach
Rent in its close-bound, stony coverings.
Yea! Tenfold honour, and the love of men,
The kind, the good, attend on Genius then,
And bless and sanctify those words divine.
Such words, Charles Dickens, truly have been thine;
And thou hast earned true glory with all love:
Long may the torch of Christmas gladly shine
Upon thy home, while voices from above
Music thy carol and again impart
Mirth and good tidings to the poor man's heart.

Charles Dickens

From: The Examiner, September 21, 1844 p.598

By Walter Savage Landor

Go then to Italy; but mind
To leave the pale low France behind;
Pass through that country, nor ascend
The Rhine, nor over Tyrol wend:
Thus all at once shall rise more grand
The glories of the ancient land.

Dickens! how often, when the air
Breath'd genially, I've thought me there,
And rais'd to heaven my thankful eyes
To see three spans of deep blue skies.

In Genoa now I hear a stir,
A shout . . . Here comes the Minister!
Yes, thou art he, although not sent
By cabinet or parliament;
Yes, thou art he. Since Milton's youth
Bloom'd in the Eden of the South,
Spirit so pure and lofty none
Hath heavenly Genius from his throne
Deputed on the banks of Thames.
To speak his voice and urge his claims,
Let every nation know from thee
How less than lovely Italy
Is the whole world beside; let all
Into their grateful breasts recall
How Prospero and Miranda dwelt
In Italy; the griefs that melt
The stoniest heart, each sacred tear
One lachrymatory gathered here;

All Desdemona's, all that fell
In playful Juliet's bridal cell.

Ah! could my steps in life's decline
Accompany or follow thine!
But my own vines are not for me
To prune, or from afar to see.
I miss the tales I used to tell
With cordial Hare and joyous Gell,

And that good old Archbishop whose Cool library, at evening's close (Soon as from Ischia swept the gale
And heav'd and lift the darkening sail)
Its lofty portal opened wide
To me and very few beside:
Yet large his kindness. Still the poor
Flock round Taranto's palace-door
And find no other to replace
The noblest of a noble race.
Amid our converse you would see
Each with white cat upon his knee,
And flattering that grand company:
For Persian kings might proudly own
Such glorious cats to share the throne.

Write me few letters: I'm content
With what for all the world is meant;
Write then for all; but since my breast
Is far more faithful than the rest,
Never shall any other share
With little Nelly nestling there.

To Charles Dickens, on his “Oliver Twist.”

From: Tragedies, to which are added a few Sonnets and Verses, by T.N. Talfourd, Edward Moxon, 1844 p.244

By T.N. Talfourd

Not only with the Author's happiest praise
Thy work should be rewarded: 'tis akin
To DEEDS of men, who scorning ease to win
A blessing for the wretched, pierce the maze
Which heedless ages spread around the ways
Where fruitful Sorrow tracks its parent Sin;
Content to listen to the wildest din
Of passion, and on fellest shapes to gaze,
So they might earn the power which intercedes
With the bright world and melt it for within Wan Childhood's squalid haunts, where basest needs
Make tyranny more bitter, at thy call
An angel face with patient sweetness sheds
For infant suffering to the heart of all.

A Sonnet to Charles Dickens

From: Douglas Jerrold's Shilling Magazine, March 1845
p.250

Oh, potent wizard! painter of great skill!
Blending with life's realities the hues
Of a rich fancy; sweetest of all singers!
Charming the public ear, and at thy will
Searching the soul of him thou dost amuse,
And the warm heart's recess, where mem'ry lingers,
And child-like love, and sympathy, and ruth,
And every blessed feeling, which the world
Had frozen or repressed with its stern apathy
For human suffering!" crabbed age, and youth,"
And beauty, smiling tearful, turn to thee,
Whose "Carol" is an allegory fine,
The burden of whose "CHIMES" is holy and benign

“Boz”

From: Joe Miller the Younger, V.1, 1845 p.13

IT’S so long since Dickens has written a book,
That all the world’s authors consider it rum of him;
They hint that he’s dead, with a wink and a look,
If he’s not, what the Dickens on earth has become of him?

The American's Apostrophe to Boz

From: The Book of Ballads, Edited by Bon Gaultier (Theodore Martin and W.E. Aytoun), Wm. S. Orr and Co. 1845, p.81-86

Rapidly As oblivion does its work now-a-days, the burst of amiable indignation with which enlightened America received the issue of Boz's "Notes," can scarcely yet be forgotten. Not content with waging a universal rivalry in the piracy of the work, Columbia showered upon its author the riches of its own choice vocabulary of abuse; while some of her more fiery spirits threw out playful hints as to the propriety of gouging the "strannger," and furnishing him with a permanent suit of tar and feathers, in the very improbable event of his paying them a second visit. The perusal of these animated expressions of free opinion suggested the following lines, which those who remember Boz's book, and the festivities with which he was all but hunted to death, will at once understand. We hope we have done justice to the bitterness and "immortal hate" of these thin-skinned sons of freedom.]

Sneak across the wide Atlantic, worthless London's puling child,
Better that its waves should bear thee, than the land
thou hast reviled;
Better in the stifling cabin, on the sofa should'st thou lie,
Sickening as the fetid nigger bears the greens and bacon
by.
Better, when the midnight horrors haunt the strained and creaking ship,
Thou should'st yell in vain for brandy with a fever-
sodden lip;

When amid the deepening darkness and the lamp's expiring shade,
From the bagman's berth above thee comes the bountiful cascade.
Better than upon the Broadway thou should'st be at noon-day seen,
Smirking like a Tracy Tupman with a Mantalini mien,
With a rivulet of satin falling o'er thy puny chest, Worse than even N. P. Willis for an evening party dressed!

We received thee warmly — kindly — though we knew thou wert a quiz,
Partly for thyself it may be, chiefly for the sake of Phiz!
Much we bore and much we suffered, listening to remorseless spells
Of that Smike's unceasing drivellings, and these everlasting Nells.
When you talk of babes and sunshine, fields, and all that sort of thing,
Each Columbian inly chuckled, as he slowly sucked his sling;
And though all our sleeves were bursting, from the many hundreds near,
Not one single scornful titter rose on thy complacent ear.

Then to show thee to the ladies, with our usual want of sense
We engaged the place in Park Street at a ruinous expense;
Ev'n our own three-volumed Cooper waived his old prescriptive right,
And deluded Dickens figured first on that eventful night. .
Clusters of uncoated Yorkers, vainly striving to be cool,
Saw thee desperately plunging through the perils of La

Poule;
And their muttered exclamation drowned the tenor of the tune, — “Don’t he heat all natur hollow? Don’t he foot it like a ‘ coon?.”

Did we spare our brandy-cocktails, stint thee of our whisky-grogs?
Half the juleps that we gave thee would have floored a Newman Noggs;
And thou took’st them in so kindly, little was there then to blame,
To thy parched and panting palate sweet as mother’s milk they came.
Did the hams of old Virginny find no favor in thine eyes?
Came no soft compunction o’er thee at the thought of pumpkin pies?
Could not all our care and coddling teach thee how to draw it mild?
But, no matter, we deserve it. Serves us right! We spoilt the child!

You, forsooth, must come crusading, boring us with broadest hints
Of your own peculiar losses by American reprints.
Such an impudent remonstrance never in our face was flung;
Lever stands it, so does Ainsworth; you, I guess, may hold your tongue.
Down our throats you’d cram your projects, thick and hard as pickled salmon,
That, I s’pose, you call free-trading, I pronounce it utter gammon.
No, my lad, a cuter vision than your own might soon have seen,
That a true Columbian ogle carries little that is green.

Quite enough we pay, I reckon, when we stump a cent or two
For the voyages and travels of a freshman such as you.

I have been at Niagara, I have stood beneath the Falls,
I have marked the water twisting over its rampagious walls;
But “a holy calm sensation,” one, in fact, of perfect peace,
Was as much my first idea as the thought of Christmas geese.
As for “old familiar faces,” looking through the misty air,
Surely you were strongly liquored when you saw your Chuckster there.
One familiar face, however, you will very likely see,
If you’ll only treat the natives to a call in Tennessee,
Of a certain individual, true Columbian every inch,
In a high judicial station, called by ‘mancipators, Lynch.
Half-an-hour of conversation with his worship in a wood Would, I strongly notion, do you an infernal deal of good.
Then you’d understand more clearly than you ever did before,
Why an independent patriot freely spits upon the floor,
Why he gouges when he pleases, why he whittles at the chairs,
Why for swift and deadly combat still the bowie-knife
he bears: —
Why he sneers at the Old Country with republican disdain,
And, unheedful of the negro’s cry, still tighter draws his chain.
All these things the judge shall teach thee of the land
thou hast reviled;
Get thee o’er the wide Atlantic, worthless London’s

puling child!

A Friendly Epistle from Aldobrandensis

From Mephystopheles, January 24, 1846

CHARLEY DICKENS, be not too bold,
Your Daily News is very old,
And will not prove a mine of gold.

How could you, Charley, lend your name
To such a vulgar, losing game,
The winding-sheet of all your fame?

Charley, my friend, retreat by times,
Attend to my prophetic rhymes:
He hazards much who wayward climbs —

From height to height the Alpine steep,
The eagle's nest, the giant's leap;
Slow and sure's the way to creep.

Stick to your novels, tales, and chimes,
Or seek Italia's sunny climes,
Not think to supersede the Times.

Titania Dickens to Bottom, “The Daily News”

From: Mephystopheles, February 14, 1846

Come rest in this bosom, my own stricken donkey,
Nor heed Times nor Chronicle, Grandma nor Flunkey:
Though the leaders are scorned by my own Daily News,
I who wrote them, to read them will never refuse.

What's an Editor made for, if he isn't the brick,
Circulation or none, to his paper to stick?
I know not, I ask not, if they buy you or not,
I but know that I edit thee — therefore they ought.

Thou hast called me thy “Dickens” in moments of bliss,
Still the Dickens I'll play with thee even in this;
While there's shot in the locker thy fortune is mine,
While a copper is left I am thy valentine.

The Blind Girl to the Rose (for music)

From: The Dramatic and Musical Review, February 14, 1846, by J.H. Jewell [relating to an incident in chapter two of The Cricket on the Hearth]

By J.H. Jewell

Sweet flower, the joyous sun is on thee shining,
Tinting thy blossoms with its ruddy beams,
And all night long, gay fancy hath been twining
Thy opening blossoms in my rosy dreams.

Sweet flower, I know around me thou art flinging
Thy sweetest fragrance on the balmy air;
While on the floating breeze thine odour's winging
Its incense to the throne I seek in prayer.

Sweet flower, I love thee; and that love possessing,
My mind beholds thee, beautiful to see;
And to thee, Heaven, I offer up my blessing,
For sending gifts so precious unto me.

Homage to the Author of the “Christmas Carol”

From: Poems by Harriet and Rose Acton, printed for the authors by George Ibbs, 1847, p.97-99

By H.A.

There is a name, a magic name,
That bringeth visions bright,
And calleth lasting memories up,
With fire each eye to light.

Familiar as a household word,
Who loveth not its sound
Whene'er it comes, with smiles or tears,
Its spell to cast around?

Steals there not ever o'er our souls,
Beneath its sway, a gleam
Of noble thoughts and stirring truths,
As 'twere a sunny dream?

Whose, then, that name so widely known,
To which with pride we bow?
Whose, then, the mighty hand that strikes
A chord untouched till now?

Who, in the ever-varied page
Of trying woe or mirth,
Hath roused our better self to aid
The lowly ones of earth?

Friend of the humble and the poor!
Oh! proud may England be,

‘Mid princely wealth and high renown,
To boast of one like thee.

Ne’er shall the Christmas holly green
Our festal board entwine,
But ‘twill recall, with deathless voice,
Each thrilling word of thine.

Ne’er shall we feel the winter blast,
Or hear the tempest wild,
But thy remembrance will invoke
Our aid for Sorrow’s child.

Pass, then, upon thy proud career,
Still wider fame to seek;
Thy hand hath pointed out the tear
On Poverty’s wan cheek.

Shine ever from thy lofty height,
As doth a brilliant star;
Yet hast thou nobly sought and won
A brighter glory far.

The erring and the hardened heart,
That, touched by thee, hath turned
To aid, in penitence and tears,
The misery it spurned.

The prayers and blessings of the poor,
That greet thee day by day,
These, these shall twine for thee a wreath
That fadeth not away.

By John Forster

GENIUS AND ITS REWARDS ARE BRIEFLY TOLD:
A LIBERAL NATURE AND A NIGGARD DOOM,
A DIFFICULT JOURNEY TO A SPLENDID TOMB.
NEW-WRIT, NOR LIGHTLY WEIGHED, THAT STORY OLD
IN GENTLE GOLDSMITH'S LIFE I HERE UNFOLD: THRO' OTHER THAN LONE WILD OR DESERT-
GLOOM,
IN ITS MERE JOY AND FAIN, ITS BLIGHT AND BLOOM,
ADVENTUROUS. COME WITH ME AND BEHOLD, O FRIEND WITH HEART AS GENTLE FOR DISTRESS,
AS RESOLUTE WITH WISE TRUE THOUGHTS
TO BIND
THE HAPPIEST TO THE UNHAPPIEST OF OUR EIND,
THAT THERE IS FIERCER CROWDED MISERY
IN GARRET-TOIL AND LONDON LONELINESS THAN IN CRUEL ISLANDS 'MID THE FAR-OFF SEA.

Charles Dickens

From: The Examiner, October 5, 1850

By Walter Savage Landor

Call we for harp or song,
Accordant numbers, measured out, belong
Alone, we hear, to bard.
Let him this badge, for ages worn, discard;
Richer and nobler now
Than when the close trimm'd laurel markt his brow,
And from one fount his thirst
Was slaked, and from none other proudly burst
Neighing, the winged steed.
Gloriously fresh were those young days indeed!
Clear, if confined the view;
The feet of giants swept that early dew;
More graceful came behind,
And golden tresses waved upon the wind.
Pity and Love were seen
In earnest converse on the humble green;
Grief too was there, but Grief
Sat down with them, nor struggled from relief, Strong Pity was, strong he.
But little Love was bravest of the three,
At what the sad one said
Often he smiled, the Pity shook her head.
Descending from their clouds,
The Muses mingled with admiring crowds;
Each had her ear inclined,
Each caught and spoke the language of mankind
Prom choral thraldom free. . . .
Dickens! didst thou teach them or they teach thee?

Little Nell

From: The Poetical and Prose Remains of Edward Marsh Heavisides, Longman, Brown, Green and Longman, 1850, p.131-132

By E. Marsh Heavisides

Sweet, gentle, patient, angel Nell!
Earth doth not inherit,
Since she is dead, one human shape
That holds so pure a spirit;
Hopeful, truthful, loving, kind,
Artless, graceful, mild,
Struggling through the ways of life,
A woman-thoughted child.

No childish joys her spirit knew —
No laughing playmates came,
With merry hearts and bounding steps,
To join in gladsome game;
To break the gloom that seemed to hang Around her dwelling-place,
And take the sorrow from her heart,
The sadness from her face.

Without a mother's care to tend,
When most such care is needed;
Growing, like a wild-wood rose,
Uncultured and unheeded:
No father's loving voice to teach,
Or loving hand to guide;
But a lonely child in a lonely house,
And an old man by her side.

A feeble, care-worn, poor old man,
With sunken cheek and eye
That long had lost the light of thought,
And dwelt on vacancy:
White his thin hair as white could be —
And on his aged brow,
That bent beneath its inward weight,
The wrinkles gathered now.

With such a mate the child was left —
With such a poor old man,
Who held her dearer than his breath,
Her round of life began.
She seemed the genius of Spring,
With Winter looking o'er her,
Herself the rosy bud of life,
The leaf of age before her.

Yet, oh! she loved this poor old man
Beyond imagining,
And hovered round his high-backed chair
Like bird upon the wing:
Went like a beam of light around
His home, a dreary place,
Till the very walls seemed giving back
The sweetness of her face.

Through many a trial, nobly borne,
The child of sorrow passed,
And traces sad of grief and care
Her sweet face overcast —
Yearning for all things pure and good,
With spirit still sublime,
She wandered on, temptation proof,
Mid poverty and crime.

Hunger and pain she heeded not —

But, toiling on her way,
She blessed each moon-encircled night
And sun-bright Summer day —
A pilgrim with unwearied feet
She struggled nobly on,
Nor drooped in heart, nor pined in woe,
Until the goal was won.

From: Sermons on Sonnets; with a text of the New Year and other poems, Chauncy Hare Townsend, Chapman and Hall, 1851 p.293-294

By Chauncy Hare Townsend

Man of the genial mind! to thee a debt
No usurer records I largely owe!
Thy portraitures of life so warmly glow,
They clear the spirit of its old regret,
And, from the very heart that's smarting yet,
At human baseness, bid kind feelings flow.
'Tis thine our nature's lights and shades to show,
Redeeming these by those, till we forget
The evil in the good. Thy vigorous hand
Smites but to heal, and turns with master-ease
The mighty engine of the popular mind
To indignation, which shall purge the land
Of sanction'd sins. For such high services
I thank thee in the name of human kind!

"That light is loveliest which doth least decay, Small though it be, and common to the sight."
This thought came o'er me on a troublous night,
A care-toss'd wanderer, as, amidst the play
Of the red lightning and the tempest's sway,
I mark'd a glow-worm's soft confiding light,
Not blown out by the winds, nor suffering blight,
Serene amidst confusion's holiday.
Then was I gladden'd, for methought I saw,
Made visible, the lamp of some pure soul,
Fed by the oil of calm continual prayer,

Humble, yet steadfast in religious awe,
Which wavers not, though tempests round it roll,
Though earth be shaken, and the powers of air.

A Sonnet to Charles Dickens, Esq.

From: The Examiner, July 8, 1854 p.426

By "Double-you"

As glistening rain refresheth thirsty earth,
As dew brings sweeter life unto the flowers.
So, unto hosts of lives thy varied powers
Have given to heart and mind a better birth.
When Moses touched the rock, in the old day,
Lo! welcome streams most genially fell;
So doth thy pen delightfully compel
The hardest heart to yield unto thy sway.
Thy themes, as poet, chiefly hope and love,
Thy aim, the happy good of all thy race;
Thy power, to mirth and sorrow both can move;
Can smooth our journey to that Higher Place.
Thou master of most pleasant Humor-wit,
Thine is the largest Heart-mind ever writ!

Dear friend, whose genial mind
And graphic pen
In joy and sorrow bind

Whose heart hath in its core

Sonnet to Charles Dickens

From: Such is Life, Sketches (and Poems) by Doubleyou, Dedicated by permission to Charles Dickens, Esq. Samuel Eyre, 1857 p.5

By Doubleyou

Even the very purest earthly brain,
Nothing that thou hast taught need wish unknown
The greatest depth of nature thou hast shown —
The tenderest sympathy with want and pain.
For suffering weakness thou hast ever fought,
And battled for the helpless in the land —
The holiest work man can take in hand —
Displaying love for all that God hath wrought.
Thought of thy name is, to the spirit's ear,
Like old tunes charged with memories of the past;
Or leafy air to one nigh all the year
In the close town by circumstance held fast.
Thy bettering perception is so fine, —
To read thy books is like a draught of wine!

To Charles Dickens, Esq.

From: Poetical Miscellanea, by a Commander on Her Majesty's Indian Navy (William Igglesden), William Skeffington, 1858 p.128-129

By William Igglesden

Master of pathos as of mirth,
Thy pen depicts each inmost feeling,
Nor lives or moves upon this earth,
Aught which escapes thy keen revealing.

This night tears follow'd close on smiles,
Yet true to nature thus commingling,
For sympathy the heart beguiles,
E'en with the throb of sorrow tingling.

Thy "Carol" thus with love imbued,
Shews that no lot, howe'er distressing,
May not in moral rectitude,
Receive or give a Christmas blessing.

The churlish niggard will relent,
When o'er his heart thy spirit's brooding,
And spend, or willing to be spent,
For others weal, whilst least obtruding.

And like the silent gentle dew,
When o'er the grateful earth distilling,
Perfumes and treasures not a few,
So may thy "spirit" in fulfilling,

Its destiny, now haply sent

To open hands, or hearts to soften,
Shall well reward thy service lent
To night, — Oh, were it often;

Then pray forgive this feeble lay,
Which from the springs of truth is welling,
And many a happy new year's day,
Attend thee in thy present dwelling.

Chatham,
Midnight, December 22nd, 1857.

Note. — Mr. Dickens gave a gratuitous reading this evening at the Mechanics' Institute, of his "Christmas Carol," to a numerous and respectable auditory, the proceeds, somewhere between £70 and £80, being devoted in furtherance of increasing its library and other claims. — I felt impelled to embody my feelings in the above versification, ere I gave slumber to my eyelids, and it was despatched on the following morning to his residence at Gad's Hill, near Higham.

To Charles Dickens

From: The Poetical Works of Leigh Hunt, Routledge, Warne, & Routledge, 1860 p.241

By Leigh Hunt

As when a friend (himself in music's list)
Stands by some rare, full-handed organist,
And glorying as he sees the master roll
The surging sweets through all their depths of soul,
Cannot, encouraged by his smile, forbear
With his own hand to join them here and there;
And so, if little, yet add something more
To the sound's volume and the golden roar;
So I, dear friend, Charles Dickens, though thy hand
Needs but itself, to charm from land to land,
Make bold to join in summoning men's ears
To this thy new-found music of our spheres,
In hopes that by thy Household Words and thee
The world may haste to days of harmony.

Lines Addressed to Charles Dickens

From: The Three Gates, in verse, Chauncy Hare Townsend, Chapman and Hall, 1861 p. vii-ix

By Chauncy Hare Townsend

It is not for thy worldly fame
That thou art dear to me;
It is not for thy lofty name
That I so cherish thee.

Perhaps, ere all thy worth I knew,
Thy glory charm'd my sight;
But what is glory, when the view
Beholds a spirit's light?

Shame on the maxim — hearts unwise
Draw from themselves that lore —
“A hero seen by daily eyes
A hero is no more!”

Thou art but held at higher rate
When nearer understood;
The gaze that sinks the merely great
Exalts the truly good.

I saw thee from afar compel
The crowd with magic art;
Beneath the power that wove the spell
I found the genial heart.

And, when thy inner spirit gave
Its treasures unto me,
Thy proudest act seemed but a wave

Of that rich boundless sea.

Oh, 'tis a sacred thing to gaze
On springs great minds that feed;
E'en as the sun excels its rays
The thought outshines the deed.

Yet, when thy hand in friendship's link
I grasp, how warmly run
The currents of my soul — to think
On all that hand has done!

It is no hand of warrior, stain'd
By conquest's crimson touch;
Yet hand of warrior never gain'd
From victory so much.

Down hath it struck from places high
Of Wrongs a giant horde,
And slain old Errors flashingly
As any beaming sword.

'Tis standard to the gallant host
That forward strive: where'er
Men battle most, and struggle most,
That dauntless hand is there.

Fresh banners, with a force unspent,
Of thought it has unfurl'd:
Wielding the pen — God's instrument —
It hath waved on the World!

Then, when that hand to mine its free
Warm welcome doth extend,
I thank kind Heaven who granted me
To grasp it as a friend.

(From Dickens' "David Copperfield")

From: Poems upon Various Subjects, James R. Withers, C.W. Naylor, 1861 V.III p.62-67

By James R. Withers

Thou sad and sullen river,
Thou art hurrying, like me,
To lose thyself for ever
In a dark and troubled sea:
In every billow throbbing,
In waves that lash the shore,
I hear thy spirit sobbing,
For peace thou'lt know no more!

I wander o'er the arches,
That span thee wide and high,
Not heed the onward marches,
Of thousands passing by!
I feel some great attraction,
A morbid sympathy;
My mind, in its distraction,
Claims kindred now with thee.

Thou cam'st from fields and flowers,
A tiny laughing spring,
And danced through willow bowers,
Where early linnets sing:
By peaceful hamlets flowing,
Through many a fairy glen,
Still wider, deeper, growing,
Thou'st reached this hive of men,

And I, of lowly station,
Why did I ever roam?
I yielded to temptation,
And left my humble home;
I saw false pleasures painted.
In colors, not their own;
And now like thee I'm tainted.
Polluted by the town!

Alone, contemn'd and slighted.
Amidst this Babel din;
I stand, a being blighted,
Beneath the blast of sin.
My soul to frenzy driven,
Would break its prison bars;
I dare not think of heaven.
Nor look upon the stars.

The stars are all too holy,
Too spotless and too chaste;
Remorse and melancholy
Are all my soul can taste;
A loathsome reptile creeping,
I shun the light of day,
And horrors never sleeping,
Upon my vitals prey.

Oh! wretched and degraded,
Corrupted and defiled!
And I — thus sullied, faded —
Was once a simple child,
And loved the whole creation —
So beautiful and fair,
And knelt in adoration,
And lisp'd an artless prayer.

Home, friends and early training,

And my first steps in crime,
Like injured ghosts complaining,
Why haunt me at this time?
Why mock my abject state thus,
With what I might have been?
A gulph now separates us,
The yawning gulph of sin!

Behold this shatter'd ruin,
This finger-mark of scorn,
This wreck is all thy doing,
Proud man! with titles born.
The flowers will all upbraid me,
And every guileless lamb,
O monster! you have made me
The wretched thing I am.

I curse thee in my trouble,
And curses in my death
Shall rise with every bubble,
As I give up my breath.
They'll mar thy hours of gladness!
They'll meet thee on thy hearth
And lash thee into madness
Amidst they wine and mirth!

I hear the wild fiend's laughter,
My guardian angel's sigh;
I shrink at the hereafter,
I wish, yet fear to die:
Why o'er the waters hover?
I can't escape my lot:
One plunge – and all is over,
And I shall be forgot.

The Death of Little Nell

From: The Quiver, V. II, third series, 1867 p.171

By A.W. Hume Butler

She spoke of music in the air, of music passing sweet,
Perhaps the escort spirits there moved their harmonious feet,

Or else the golden harps of heaven beguiled her with their play,

That unaware the angel hands might steal her soul away.

Anon she slept; but, waking soon, would kiss us each again,

While a whisper lingered on the lip that fashioned it in vain;

And by the beating of our hearts, that were so still before,

We knew the pretty weary face would light our hearth no more.

Then the soft blue eyes were shrouded, and the sweet white brow grew cold,

But the sunlight faded not away from the young hairs'
rippling gold;

And the little mouth seemed ready still to draw another breath,

Though the singing lips were silent in the pallid halls of death.

Her gentle playmates brought in flowers, pale flowers that suited best —

We all remembered how in life she wore them on her breast,

So there we placed them, and we crossed the small thin hands above,

And wept to see them lie so quiet on the flowers they used to love.

But now, when trail the twilight shades athwart the evening

sky,

And the last ray of sunset rests on the village spire to die,
We think of that glorious life of hers, in the radiant land
of

day,

And bless the Power that wisely drew her stainless soul away.

Little Addresses to Big Names

From: Fun, August 17, 1867 p.244

Poet in prose,
How many a heart hath shaken off awhile
 Its weight of woes;
How many a tear hath melted in a smile –
How many a selfish sigh and sorrow,
 Diverted from our own distress,
Hath pow'r been given thee to borrow
 By very force of gentleness!

Sam Weller, Pecksniff, Quilp, and Richard Swiveller,
 Are all before us where to choose a favourite.
Sweet Nelly, and that grand-paternal driveller,
 Whose folly has a tender touch to flavour it.
Uriah Heep, the sentimental sniveller,
 Whose name requires a sea of scents to savour it; –
The dental Carker, too, our soul's abhorrence –
Dear Captain Cuttle, Paul, and little Florence.

Yes, well may one excuse us,
With such a stock-in-trade upon our shelves,
 For laughing or for crying as you choose us,
And quite forgetting all about ourselves.
 We picture, as we wander
On sunny days about the Temple Garden,
 John Chester smiling at a window yonder,
And then we dream of Hugh and Dolly Varden.

Who could think of stopping single
 For a moment of his life,
After knowing Peerybingle
 And his darling of a wife?

Who can watch the coming coldly
Of the merry Christmas times,
That has followed Trotty boldly
To the belfry and the chimes?

We will not blame you if your pen is idle,
Or goes to sleep on such a reputation;
The fault is Time's if Time has put a bridle
Upon your fancy and imagination.
We leave it for the critics to complain,
And say your early novels were the greater ones;
But as you cannot give us those again,
We wish to see the latest of your later ones.

An Ode to Boz

From: Fun, March 26, 1870 p.32

Some Canard-hatcher, reckoning on his chickens,
Has laid an egg –
A paragraph in short
Of such a sort,
That I – although without your leave – must beg
To give it contradiction, Mr. Dickens!

He says you are to be created knight –
A degradation quite –
A fitting end for mayors and all such cattle,
No longer a distinction won in battle.
Why who – (my rage, my circulation quickens) –
Who would consent Sir Anything to be
When he Could keep the prouder title, plain “Charles Dickens”?

Nor should he barter that to be a baron –
Why, bless my heart!
No Baron peerage – Marquis, Duke, or Viscount,
Would I count
As a distinction that could mate – that’s poz –
With Boz!

The simple dignity of such a name,
With its estates in love, regard, and fame,
For no high title – high as Salisbury’s steeple –
Will Boz, I fancy, swop –
But wisely stop
The one “Charles Dickens” of the English people.

Charles Dickens: Obit June 9th, 1870

From: Punch and Judy, June 18, 1870

The hand is cold, the heart is still,
The mind, but yesterday, that shed
Its ripened genius o'er the world,
Is numbered with the mighty dead.

'Tis but a month we heard his voice
Lament his friend* who'd gone before;
Now, stricken by Death's awful hand,
He, too, has found the same dark shore.

He's gone: full oft the times will come
When we shall miss his kindly face.
He's gone: in vain around we look
And search for one to fill his place.

He was the friend of all: his name
Was known and loved from zone to zone ' ,
Where'er the English tongue is heard
There each must feel the loss his own.

His skilful pen for many a year
Has Christian love and kindness taught:
He made us laugh, he made us weep,
But never raised an impure thought.

He loved mankind: our social wrongs
He strove — and not in vain — to heal;
With stern reproach, or genial mirth,
To human hearts he made appeal.

He's dead! Yet though he's passed away,
His peer although 'twere hard to find,
He still will live in every heart,
In every English home enshrined.

*William Thackeray

In Memoriam – June 9, 1870

From: The Graphic, June 18, 1870 p.678

“For that is not a common chance
That takes away a noble mind.” — Tennyson.

AH! sad for England that she mourns to-day
The genial, tender heart, the master mind
That spent themselves for her! Where shall we find
One left like him whom God has called away?

Who now shall wake our laughter and our tears,
And teach us honour for the good and great,
Shall bid us feel for wrong a noble hate,
Like him whose books have been our friends for years?

Who now remains Satire’s keen sword to raise
With strength like his, a righteous war to rage
Against the sins and follies of our age?
As the knights-errant of chivalrous days —

Whose swords to succour the oppressed,
But smote with fiercest anger wicked men,
So he, our great knight-errant of the pen,
Wielded his weapon till God gave him rest.

Farewell, our teacher, playfellow, and friend!
Little it matters where thy grave is made,
Whether where England’s mightiest dead are laid,
Or where the vaulted heavens above thee bend; —

Thy resting-place is in the people’s heart,
Which throbbed with sorrow when the tidings came
That all now left to England is the name

Of him who nobly used a noble art.

Charles Dickens

From: Punch, or the London Charivari, June 18, 1870 p.244

Born February 7, 1812 Died June 9, 1870

While his life's lamp seemed clearest, most intense,
A light of wit and love to great and small,
By the dark angel he is summoned hence
To solve the mightiest mystery of all!

Hearing that he has passed beyond the veil,
Before the Judge that metes to men their dues,
Men's cheeks through English-speaking lands turn pale,
Far as the speaking wires can bear the news.

Blanched at this sudden snapping of a life,
That seemed of all our lives to hold a share,
So were our memories with his fancies rife,
So much of his thought our thoughts seemed to bear.

Charles Dickens dead! It is as if a light
In every English home were quenched to-day;
As if a face all knew had passed from sight,
A hand all loved to press were turned to clay.

Question who will his power, its range, its height,
His wisdom, insight — this, at least, we know,
All in his love's warmth and his humour's light
Rejoiced and revelled — old, young, high, low.

Learned and unlearned — from the boy at school
To the judge on the bench, none read but owned
The large heart o'er which the large brain held rule,
The fancy by whose side clear sense sat throned.

The observation that made all its own,
The shaping faculty that breathed life's breath
In types, all felt they knew and still had known,
Life-like, except that they are safe from death.

Since Shakespeare, where the pen that so hath lent
Substance to airy nothings of the brain,
His fancies seem with men's experience blent
Till to take each for other we are fain?

And who that ever wielded such a power
Used it so purely to a Christian end;
Used it to quicken the millennial hour,
When rich and poor shall be as friend to friend?

Who can say how much of that love's pure leaven
That leavens now the lump of this our world,
With influence as of a present heaven,
Like light athwart chaotic darkness hurled,

May be traced up to springs by him unsealed,
To clods by him stirred round affection's roots,
To hearts erst hard but by his fire annealed
To softness, whereof Love's works are the fruits!

Mourn, England, for another great one gone
To join the great ones who have gone before —
And put a universal mourning on Where'er sea beats on English-speaking shore.

His works survive him and his works' works too,
Of love and kindness and good will to men,
Hate of the wrong and reverence of the true,
And war on all that shuns truth's eagle ken.

Earth's two chief nations mourners at his tomb

Their memories for his monument; their love
For his reward. Such is his glorious doom,
 Whom mortal praise or blame no more shall move.

In Memory

From: Fun (New Series), June 25, 1870, p.157

THERE swept a sigh of sorrow universal
From melancholy Medway's mournful strand.
Upon the nightwind's desolate dispersal,
To float along the land.

The closing eve had had no shade of sorrow;
In silver haze we saw the planets swim;
But when the sun arose upon the morrow,
We felt the dawn was dim.

With grief-drown'd eyes we read — how briefly stated! —
That he was gone — the man of pure renown:
As if some bark, with our best treasures freighted,
Had in the dark gone down!

'Twas but a whisper, yet more widely sounding
Than the hoarse guns that for dead warriors roar,
A thrill electric circled all surrounding,
And spread from shore to shore.

And that sad circle stretching, still unbroken,
Around the world to utmost regions sped,
And tears were shed, where'er our tongue is spoken,
To know Charles Dickens — dead!

Within the Abbey let him take his slumber,
Make room, oh great ones of the Long Ago;
In your grand roll Charles Dickens thus to number,
Ye smile, blest shades, we know!

Not his the coronet, or ermine legal,
No herald-blazoned office in the state!

Without a title, to the Council Regal
But summoned when too late.

Here lay him down: the dust where he reposes
Is glorious dust of the illustrious dead:

And where he lies shall blossom God's rare roses
When sounds the summons dread!

Calm be his sleep — despite warm tears above him —
Who loved the weak, and never feared the strong,

Whose page was pure, who made all good hearts love
him,
Who felt for others' wrong.

Yet though he sleeps lamented of a nation,
The good he did for us shall ne'er decay;

They live — the beings of his fine creation —
To make us glad for aye!

Charles Dickens

From: The Jewish Record, August 5, 1870

By Edwin Tomlin

THOU Shakespeare of our day, farewell,
Rich fancies in thy soul did dwell,
And Nature sweet, with magic spell
Did guide thy wondrous pen.

Bless'd by the Great Omnipotent,
Forth, mighty teacher, thou wast sent;
He made thee His grand instrument
To change the hearts of men.

He mirror'd greatness in thy mind,
Thou ever gentle, good, and kind,
Physician to the mental blind,
What toil hast thou endur'd!

To Virtue shall thy works entice
The guilty from the side of Vice,
To where Truth points to Paradise,
And crowns may be secur'd.

Thy pure thoughts o'er the world are spread,
From palace to the poor man's shed,
They oft soothe Sickness on its bed,
With balm of sterling worth.

Thy part has been in this vast sphere,
To urge sweet Pity — dry Grief's tear,
And with thy matchless wit to cheer;
Thy name but breath'd caus'd mirth.

In peace are hush'd thy hopes and fears
For this our land, now bath'd in tears
For thee, whose bright name it reveres,
Proud of thy learned lore.

Unchang'd shall thy lov'd mem'ry bloom,
Till all Earth's beauties fade in gloom,
When Judgment's thunders shake thy tomb,
And "Time shall be no more."

To His Memory

From The Argosy, August 1, 1870, p.114

Charles Dickens! Henceforth let the name be softly, gently spoken:

The silver cord of life is loosed — the golden bowl is broken. Oh! who shall now, before the great, set forth the poor man's feelings,

And win him kindlier, sweeter thought through delicate revealings?

Charles Dickens! Many a one has been, in the path of classic

glory,

Beyond him far in song of war, in thrilling, ancient story;
But who, like him, the barrier high 'twixt rich and poor removing,

Has led the differing classes all, to be together loving?

Charles Dickens! Oh, so free from pomp, from undue exaltation:

The poor man was his brother still — while worshipped by the nation.

Mothers and maidens stand aghast, as by a friend forsaken,

When they hear the sad death-news of him, whom God has gently taken.

Charles Dickens! Aye, our crowned Queen grew pale and sad — dened-hearted,

When told the worth and genius bright which had from earth

departed;

Oh, let us lay him down to rest where our greatest dead are sleeping,

And bowing to our Father's will grow calmer in our weeping!

Charles Dickens! He is with us yet, our lives shall gladness borrow

From the cheery tale, that sparkles — o'er the dull, dark cloud of sorrow;

Often our weary hearts shall be to laughter gently stirred,
And our children's children keep his name, — a happy Household

Word!

Boz

From: Putnam's Magazine, August 1870 p.232-233

Call him "Boz," for that is what we named him,
With tears and laughter,
Ere with our laurel wreath we proudly claimed him
For ever "after.

Call him "Boz " — that was our word for him
When he was young,
And unto us, from some far corner dim,
His accents rung.

In earlier days, when first we caught the glory
Just shimmering through,
The tenderest utterance — the rarest story
We ever knew!

As little children, by their mother seated,
Group softly round
To hear her stories o'er and o'er repeated,
With awe profound,

While memory brings back dreams of joy and sweetness,
Even as he willed,
We gathered at his feet — from his completeness
Our store he filled.

We loved the author, who so loved the true,
So hated wrong;
We loved the teacher, whose great soul we knew,
Tender and strong.

We felt the loving spirit of the master

in all his' creeds;
He touched the world's cold heart, and it beat faster
For human needs.

As, like an angel, visiting each dwelling
With kindly face,
He lit the fire of love, Heaven's watchword telling,
In every place.

Close up those earnest eyes to want and sorrow,
For evermore!
And bid him stand erect, upon the morrow,
Earth's labours o'er.

And, like the seraphs in the old-time vision,
Still, to and fro,
His thoughts, like spirits from yon world elysian,
Will come and go.

A Man of the Crowd to Charles Dickens

From: Gentleman's Magazine, August 1870

By E.J. Milliken

I AM but one of many; never saw
Thy face, or heard the voice that now is stilled.
My spirit is but little apt to awe
Of lofty-perched mortality; and yet
My heart is heavy with a keen regret,
Mine eyes with unaccustomed tears are filled.

We of the throng lead little lives, apart
From all the genial stir and glow of art,
The comrades of genius, and the breath
Of that large life to which our low-pulsed life is death.
Slow-footed, bowed, we toil through narrow ways,
And linger put our dull and unrecorded days.
But thou! — thou hadst an eye to mark
The feeble light that burned within our dark;
A sympathy as wide as heaven's free air;
A glance as bright
As heaven's own light,
That, pure amid pollution, pierceth everywhere.
Not beggary's rags, not squalor's grime,
The crust of ignorance, the stain of crime,
Could hide from thee the naked human soul.
Thou hadst our Shakespeare's ken, and Howard's heart;
Not puppets we, God's poor, to play our part
On thy mimetic stage, mere foils grotesque,
Apt adjuncts of thine art's bright picturesque.
Our loves, our hates, our hopes and fears,
Our sins and sorrows, smiles and tears,
To thee were real as to us, who knew

That thou wouldst limn them with a hand as true
And tender in its touch, as though it drew
The finer traits and passions of thy peers.

That sense so sure, that wit so strong,
Did battle on our side against the oppressor's wrong,
Because thine honest heart did burn with scorn

Of high-perched insolence everywhere;
And knightly, though unknighthed, thou didst dare
To champion the feeble and forlorn.

Though not in fairy forest, leaguered tower,
By haunted lake, or startled Beauty's bower,
Didst thou go seeking them; but in foul lairs
Not else remembered even in good men's prayers.
In hidden haunts of cruelty, where no light,

Save of thy sympathy, pierced the night.
Thence, though the source might all unlovely seem,
Unfit for painter's touch or poet's dream;

Thou, painter-poet as thou wert, didst draw
The hidden beauty manner eyes ne'er saw;
But which, set forth upon thy living page,
Drew all the eyes and hearts of an unthinking age.
All inarticulate we; thou wert our voice;
Thou in our poor rejoicing didst rejoice,
Smile gently with our pitiful mirth, and grieve
When Pain, our chill familiar, plucked each ragged sleeve.

Therefore we loved thee, better than we knew,
Old friend and true.
Thy silent passing to an honoured tomb
Has filled a people's heart with more than fleeting gloom.

Moreover, thou didst bring us of thy best,
Thou, with the great an honoured guest,
And treasured by the chiefs of birth and brain,
To simple and unlearned souls wert plain.
The common heart on thine enchantment hung,

While genius, stooping from her heights,
Lent to the lowest her delights,
And spake to each in his own mother tongue.
Who now like thee shall lighten human care?
By words where mirth with pathos meets,
By most delectable conceits,
Thou gav'st us laughter that our babes might share;
And jollity, that had no touch of shame.
No satyr's brand besmirches thy fair fame.
Thy meteor fancy, by its quickening sleight,
Peopled our world with creatures of delight.
Not phantoms they, but very friends they seem,
Dear and familiar as are few
Of those around us; all too true
And quick for shadows of Romance's dream.
Most human-hearted they, or grave or gay,
But touched with that unspeakable impress
Of genius, airy wit, rare tenderness,
That marks them as thine own (e'en so a ray
Of sunset glory magnifies Familiar beauties to our eyes) —
So touched, they in our memories live for aye,
Unaged by time and sacred from decay.
The friends we cherish pass, the foes we hate;
All living things towards Death's portal move;
Not even thee, a nation's pride and love
Could keep from that dark gate.
But these, thy creatures, cannot die:
Companions of all generations, they Shall keep thy mem'ry from decay
More surely than that glorious grave where thou dost lie.
Therefore, let critic carp or bigot prate,
Sniff fault or folly here and there,
Contemn thy creed, or thee declare
Not wholly wise, or something less than great.
Thou hast the people's heart, that few may gain;
Not yielded to mere strenuous might of brain,

Prowess of arm, or force of will,
But to the strong and true and tender soul,
The human in excelsis, that can thrill
Through all humanity's pulses, till the whole
Great scattered brotherhood again is one.
No chill star-radiance thine; thou art a sun
Of central warmth; lord of our smiles and tears,
And uncrowned king of men through all the years.

The Voice of Christmas Past

From: Harper's New Monthly Magazine, January 1871 p.187

By Mrs. Zadel B. Buddington

The Festival

Bring holly leaves, of polished green;
The Christmas feast is bravely set,
And over all the earth, I ween,
The countless Christmas guests are met
The sunlit air is throbbing fast
With gleeful clang of Christmas bells:
One smote them In the festal past
To cheer sad hearts in prison cells.

The world demands surcease of strife,
And claims the year's last week of life.

The ruddy wine, so rare to sip
In joyous laugh, and airy jest
Is born upon the glowing lip,
And wit hath wings from guest to guest;
Yet oft o'er all is overspread
The halo of a sainted death,
And mirth's gay chords fall out of tune: —
The glossy holly overhead
Emits the sweetest phantom breath
Of roses culled in early June!

The shadow of a great name lies
On pensive brows, in thoughtful eyes;
The memory of a great heart swells
Each bosom where his image dwells.
The carol of the poor he sung;
The sick, imprisoned, suffering, vile
Had mighty champion in his tongue,
Nor sinned beyond his tender smile.

O faithful voice of "Little Nell,"
O holy thoughts of "Tiny Tim,"
Sound ever in the organ's swell,
Ring ever in the Christmas bell,
Inspire the universal hymn!

O purity, and truth, and worth,
One noble spirit sought you long;
In bloom of deeds array the earth,
And keep his memory green in song!

While the "rare old plant," the ivy, climbs
And wreathes the tongues of his silent chimes.

A TRIBUTE TO DICKENS.

From: Poems, by Will M. Carleton, Lakeside Publishing and Printing Co. 1871 p.34-38

Across the foaming sea of words and thought,
Where heavier craft were struggling with the storm,
The winds one day an unknown vessel brought)
Of flaunting streamer and fantastic form.
Old captains gazed, and Wondered at her route,
And gravely shook their grizzled heads in doubt;
And critics nursed their literary ire,
And quickly loaded up their guns to fire.

But crowding sail, she cut the dangerous waves,
Swept past old wrecks and signals of distress,
And o'er forgotten hulks and nameless graves,
Straight glided to the harbor of success!
The great World gazed on her a little while,
Its careworn face grew brighter with a smile,
Until its voice caught rapture from its gaze,
And swelled into a thunder-peal of praise!
The outstript jester, smiling, dropped his pun,
The sage looked up, with laughter in his eyes;
The critic turned his double-shotted gun,
And jubilantly fired it at the skies!
The laboring throng, when their day's toil was o'er,
Crowded along the unaccustomed shore,
And viewed, with wonder and delight oft-told,
The varied treasures of her deck and hold!

For there, upon the deck, in genial state,
Stood Pickwick, captain of the motley crew;
The sturdy Samuel Weller for his mate,
And many a passenger The People knew;

And stored among her cargo of rich mirth,
Shone forth the richest diamonds of earth;
Wit, humor, pathos — all the brighter gems,
Set in a thousand flashing diadems!

And ever as they gazed, and rushed to gaze,
Came sweeping o'er the sea another gale,
And gleamed upon their glad eyes, thro' the haze,
The snowy whiteness of another sail;
Rich loaded was one bark, and fair to see,
But aimed great guns at petty tyranny;
And as she swiftly glided safe to land,
Young Captain Nickleby was in command.

Then came a ship of stranger seeming still,
With "Curiosities" in plenty stored;
And thousands crowded round her, with one will,
To view the passengers she had on board.
And one there was — her name was "Little Nell" —
The People much admired, and loved full well;
And many wept, and lingered at her side,
When peacefully she laid her down and died.

So one by one to port the vessels came,
Laden with comfort for both rich and poor,
But hurling bolts of scorn-envenomed flame
At tyrant, rogue, and snob, and titled boor.
And each new ship the multitude flocked round,
And gloated o'er the treasures that they found;
And as each sail came flashing into sight,
Broke forth a thousand plaudits of delight!

Pictures there were, that painter's brush might pine
And pray to spring from out its striving art;
The hand that drew their outlines was divine
It was the servant of a god-like heart.
The city haunts, from palace down to den,

Stood forth in glowing colors once again;
And the wide country landscape well was traced,
With river, grove, and hill, and desert waste.

And words — such fitly-spoken words as well
Were to such pictures apples of fine gold,
Upon the ears of listening millions fell,
And often by the fireside were retold.
Pity, and love, and sympathy, were there;
Sorrow, and rage, and raven-winged despair;
Denunciation, big with conscious might,
And earnest, manly pleadings for the right.

And so the millions, eager to confess
The pleasures they from his creations drew,
Hastened to praise, and glorify, and bless
The quiet man whose face they hardly knew,
Who, in his lonely room, worked for his goal,
With busy brain, and strongly-yearning soul;
And with his good pen, built, and rigged, and manned
The noble vessels which his genius planned.

But one dark day, the news flashed o'er the earth,
That he, beloved guest of many lands,
Had gone to where his regal soul had birth,
Led by the pressure of down-reaching hands.
There have been kings, reposing in the shroud,
Scorned in the laughing heart, though mourned aloud;
Here was a citizen, wept by his peers,
And deluged by a flood of heartfelt tears!

O Dickens! if in yonder star-girt land,
Thou canst but wander thro' its streets and vales,
And then before the breathless millions stand,
And tell thy merry and pathetic tales,
If thou canst yet thy daily toil prolong,
Plead for the right, and battle with the wrong,

The happiness of Heaven will o'er thee spread,
For thou thy path Heaven-given, still wilt tread!
No new laudation to thy name we raise —
 No tribute of new grief with us appears;
Through all thy life we gave thee words of praise-
 Long ere thy death we gave thee our best tears.
But wheresoever still the English tongue
In all the world is spoken, read, and sung,
Shall rise the fervent words oft-heard before — “God bless thee, glorious Dickens, evermore!”

In Memoriam: June 10th, 1870

From: Awful! and Other Jingles, P.R.S. (Peter Remsen Strong), G.P. Putnam and Son, 1871 p.114-117

By P.R.S.

I.

There's a crowd of troubled faces at the cor – ner of the street,
Where the brief and hasty bulletin is scrawled
upon the sheet,
With a terrible distinctness, that arrests the busy feet,
Of thousands moving on.

II.

It came stealing o'er the wire, with a slow and sullen spark,*
Like a storm-cloud that is brooding, when the sky is grim and dark,
And the fatal bolt is lurking, to engulf the gallant bark.
Which still goes moving on.

III.

And the men, who feel the burden of a new and heavy woe,
Get them sadly to their dwellings, with reluc – tant step and slow,
For they're thinking of the tidings that shall startle like a blow,

While they keep moving on.

IV.

Dead — thoughtless — senseless — silent! No, it cannot be! the brain,
Which has wrought so long and deftly, must be animate again
With its constant, tender sympathy for every brother's pain.
It must keep moving on!

V.

Why, the man was our great teacher in the battle-school of life!
He has shown us how to struggle, how to con- quer in a strife,
Which, for every son of Adam, is with deadly peril rife,
As Time goes moving on.

VI.

Who shall lift the fallen sceptre? Who shall grasp the wand of might?
Who shall conjure up new phantoms, to allure us or affright,
From the realms of joyous sunshine, from the shades of grisly night,
And keep them moving on?

VII.

God doeth all things wisely! — and we know 'tis for the best,

That the loving heart is pulseless and the weary brain at rest.
They have gained an immortality in every human breast —
They'll still keep moving on!

DICKENS IN CAMP.

From: Poems, by Bret Harte, J.R. Osgood, 1873 p.32-

ABOVE the pines the moon was slowly drifting,
The river sang below;
The dim Sierras, far beyond, uplifting
Their minarets of snow.

The roaring camp-fire, with rude humor, painted
The ruddy tints of health
On haggard face and form that drooped and fainted
In the fierce race for wealth;

Till one arose, and from his pack's scant treasure
A hoarded volume drew,
And cards were dropped from hands of listless leisure
To hear the tale anew;

And then, while round them shadows gathered faster,
And as the firelight fell,
He read aloud the book wherein the Master
Had writ of "Little Nell."

Perhaps 'twas boyish fancy, — for the reader
Was youngest of them all, —
But, as he read, from clustering pine and cedar
A silence seemed to fall;

The fir-trees, gathering closer in the shadows,
Listened in every spray,
While the whole camp, with "Nell" on English meadows,

Wandered and lost their way.

And so in mountain solitudes — o' ertaken
As by some spell divine —
Their cares dropped from them like the needles shaken
From out the gusty pine.

Lost is that camp, and wasted all its fire:
And he who wrought that spell? —
Ah, towering pine and stately Kentish spire,
Ye have one tale to tell!

Lost is that camp! but let its fragrant story
Blend with the breath that thrills
With hop-vines' incense all the pensive glory-
That fills the Kentish hills.
And on that grave where English oak and holly
And laurel wreaths intwine,
Deem it not all a too presumptuous folly, —
This spray of Western pine!

Mystery of Edwin Drood

From: Society, June 29, 1881 p.15

By M. Percivale

Strangely significant the half-told history,
Uncomprehended prophecy of pain;
Life's dream within a dream, death's awful mystery,
That evermore a secret must remain.

Faith's waning surely doth its page prefigure,
The Upas-unbelief of years to come;
The magic pen, in its full strength and rigour,
Points upward, ere down-dropt for ever dumb.

A choral strain of calm breathes, underlying
All jarring sounds of sorrow, sin, or strife;
The well-known voice in trumpet tones undying,
Speaks of the resurrection and the life.

Closed is the door. O fatal premonition!
How shall the mystery be solved, and where?
By the unfinished page an angel vision
Stands; and with hand uplifted answers, "There!"

Charles Dickens

From: Tristram of Lyonesse, and other Poems, Algernon Charles Swinburne, Chatto and Windus, 1882 p.217

By Algernon Charles Swinburne

Chief in thy generation born of men
Whom English praise acclaimed as English-born,
With eyes that matched the worldwide eyes of morn
For gleam of tears or laughter, tenderest then
When thoughts of children warmed their light, or when Reverence of age with love and labour worn,
Or godlike pity fired with godlike scorn,
Shot through them flame that winged thy swift live pen:
Where stars and suns that we behold not burn, Higher even than here, though highest was here thy place,
Love sees thy spirit laugh and speak and shine
With Shakespeare and the soft bright soul of Sterne
And Fielding's kindest might and Goldsmith's grace;
Scarce one more loved or worthier love than thine.

A WELCOME TO DICKENS ON HIS FIRST VISIT TO THE WEST.

From: The Gentleman Farmer, Volume 2, 1897 p.465

By W.H. Venable

— Come as artist, come as guest.
Welcome to the expectant West,
Hero of the charmed pen,
Loved of children, loved of men.
We have felt thy spell for years;
Oft with laughter, oft with tears,
Thou hast touched the tenderest part
Of our inmost, hidden heart.
We have fixed our eager gaze
On thy pages nights and days.
Wishing, us we turned them o'er.
Like poor Oliver, for “more,”
And the creatures of thy brain
In our memory remain.
Till through them we seem to be
Old acquaintances of thee.
Much we hold it thee to greet,
Gladly sit we at thy feet;
On thy features we would look,
As upon a living book.
And thy voice would grateful hear,
Glad to feel that Boz were near,
That his veritable soul
Held us by direct control:
Therefore, author loved the best,
Welcome, welcome to the West.
In immortal Weller’s name.
By the rare Micawber’s fame,

By the flogging wreaked on Squeers,
By Job Trotter's fluent tears,
By the Beadle Bumble's fate.
At the hands of shrewish mate,
By the famous Pickwick Club,
By the dream of Gabriel Grubb,
In the name of Snodgrass muse,
Tupman's amorous interviews,
Winkle's ludicrous mishaps.
And the fat boy's countless naps;
By Ben Allen and Bob Sawyer,
By Miss Sally Brass, the lawyer.
In the name of Newman Noggs,
River Thames, and London fogs,
Richard Swiveller's excess,
Feasting with the Marchioness,
By Jack Bunsby's oracles,
By the chime of Christmas bells.
By the Cricket on the Hearth,
By the sound of childish mirth.
By spread tables and good cheer.
Wayside Inns and pots of beer,
Hostess plump, and jolly host.
Coaches for the turnpike post,
Chambermaid in love with Boots.
Toodles, Traddles, Tapley, Toots,
Betsey Trottwood, Mr. Dick,
Susan Nipper, Mistress Chick,
Snevellicci, Lilyvlck,
Mantalini's predilections
To transfer his warm affections.
By poor Barnaby, and Grip.
Flora, Dora, Di, and Gip.
Perrybingle, Pinch and Pip. —
Welcome, long-expected guest,

Welcome to the grateful West.

In the name of Gentle Nell,
Child of light, beloved well, —
Weeping, did we not behold
Roses on her bosom cold?
Better we for every tear
Shed beside her snowy bier, —
By the mournful group that played
Round the grave where Smike was laid.
By the life of Tiny Tim,
And the lesson taught by him,
Asking in his plaintive tone
God to “bless us every one,”
By the smiling waves that bore
Little Paul to Heaven’s shore.
By thy yearning for the human
Good In every man and woman.
By each noble deed and word
That thy story-books record,
And each noble sentiment
Dickens to the world hath lent,
By the effort thou hast made
Truth and true reform to aid.
By thy hope of man’s relief
Finally from want and grief.
By thy never-falling trust
That the God of love is just. —
We would meet and welcome thee.
Preacher of humanity:
Welcome fills the throbbing breast
Of the sympathetic West.

From: The Coming of Love and other Poems, Theodore Watts-Dunton, John Lane, 1898 p.191-192

A ragged girl in Drury Lane was heard to exclaim: “Dickens dead? Then will Father Christmas die too?” — June 9, 1870.

“Dickens is dead!” Beneath that grievous cry
London seemed shivering in the summer heat;
Strangers took up the tale like friends that meet:
Dickens is dead! said they, and hurried by; Street children stopped their games — they knew not why,
But some new night seemed darkening down
the street.
A girl in rags, staying her way-worn feet, Cried, “Dickens dead? Will Father Christmas die?”

City he loved, take courage on thy way!
He loves thee still, in all thy joys and fears.
Though he whose smile made bright thine eyes of grey —
Though he whose voice, uttering thy bur – thened years,
Made laughters bubble through thy sea of tears —
Is gone, Dickens returns on Christmas Day!

The Centenary of Dickens

From: The Muse in Exile by William Watson, John Lane Company, 1913 p.46-49

Lines read by the author at the Dickens Centenary celebration at the Carnegie Hall, New York.

When Nature first designed,
In her all-procreant mind,
The man whom here to-night we are met to honour —
When first the idea of Dickens flashed upon her — “Where, where,” she said, “in all my populous
Earth,
Shall this prodigious child be brought to birth?
Where shall he have his earliest wondering look Into my magic book?
Shall he be born where life runs like a brook,
Far from the sound and shock of mighty deeds,
Among soft English meads?
Or shall he first my pictured volume scan
Where London lifts its hot and fevered brow,
For cooling Night to fan?
Nay, nay,” she said; “I have a happier plan!
For where, at Portsmouth, on the embattled tides,
The ships of war step out with thundering prow,
And shake their stormy sides —
In yonder place of arms, whose gaunt sea wall
Flings to the clouds the far-heard bugle-call,
He shall be born amid the drums and guns,
He shall be born among my fighting sons,
Perhaps the greatest warrior of them all.”

So there, where frown the forts and battle-gear,
And all the proud sea babbles Nelson's name,
Into the world this later hero came,
He, too, a man that knew all moods but fear,
 He, too, a fighter! Yet not his the strife
That leaves dark scars on the fair face of life.
He did not fight to rend the world apart,
He fought to make it one in mind and heart,
Building a broad and noble bridge to span
The icy chasm that sunders man from man.
Wherever Wrong had fixed its bastions deep,
There did his fierce yet gay assault surprise
Some fortress girt with lucre or with lies;
There his light battery stormed some ponderous keep;
There charged he up the steep;
A knight on whom no palsying torpor fell,
Keen to the last to break a lance with Hell.
And still undimmed his conquering weapons shine;
On his bright sword no spot of rust appears;
And still, across the years,
 His soul goes forth to battle, and in the face
Of whatsoe'er is false, or cruel, or base,
He hurls his gage, and leaps among the spears,
Being armed with pity and love, and scorn divine,
Immortal laughter, and immortal tears.

Dickensia

From: Eos and Other Poems, Eleanor Gray, Kegan Paul, Trench & Co., 1907 p.31

By Eleanor Gray

Oh, strong of heart to pass, a Galahad
Through life's abysses, pure, undefiled,
Evolving child,
Nell, Florence, Paul, by waters sad —
Childwife, or Ruth of spirit glad,
Or Agnes mild.
Oh, love that gave us Joe and Smike for care,
Ne'er prosper who betray thy trust,
So deep thy thrust.
Sikes, Fagin, loom from out their snare
Fate's scorn, humanity's despair,
The world's disgust.
Sublimest Pecksniff, cloaked, benevolent,
"Unfroked" seems Tom at length aghast-Iconoclast —
Sweep on, but leave us Tapley's bent,
Sam Weller's mirth with wisdom blent,
And Pickwick last.

TINY TIM AND BOB CRATCHIT ON CHRISTMAS DAY

“A Christmas Carol,” Stave Three

In came little Bob, the father, with at least three feet of comforter exclusive of the fringe, hanging down before him; and his threadbare clothes darned up and brushed, to look seasonable; and Tiny Tim upon his shoulder.

“Peggotty,” says I, suddenly, “were you ever married?”

“Lord, Master Davy,” replied Peggotty, “what’s put marriage in your head?”

She answered with such a start, that it quite awoke me....

“But were you ever married, Peggotty?” says I. “You are a very handsome woman, an’t you?”

PAUL DOMBEY AND FLORENCE ON THE BEACH AT BRIGHTON

PAUL DOMBEY AND FLORENCE ON THE BEACH AT BRIGHTON

“Dombey and Son,” Chapter VIII

His favourite spot was quite a lonely one, far away from most loungers; and with Florence sitting by his side at work, or reading to him, or talking to him, and the wind blowing on his face, and the water coming up among the wheels of his bed, he wanted nothing more.

"Set 'em out near the hind wheels, child, that's the best place" — said their friend, superintending the arrangements from above. "Now hand up the teapot for a little more hot water, and a pinch of fresh tea, and then both of you eat and drink as much as you can, and don't spare anything; that's all I ask of you."

MRS. KENWIGS AND THE FOUR LITTLE KENWIGSES

“Nicholas Nickleby,” Chapter XIV

“Oh! they’re too beautiful to live, much too beautiful!” sobbed Mrs. Kenwigs. On hearing this alarming presentiment . . . all four little girls raised a hideous cry, and burying their heads in their mother’s lap simultaneously, screamed until the eight flaxen tails vibrated again.

“Christmas Stories” The Holly-Tree, Second Branch

So Boots goes up-stairs to the Angel, and there he finds Master Harry on a e-normous sofa, — immense at any time, but looking like the Great Bed of Ware, compared with him, a drying the eyes of Miss Norah with his pocket-hankecher. Their little legs was entirely off the ground, of course, and it really is not possible for Boots to express to me how small them children looked.

LITTLE EM'LY

“David Copperfield,” Chapter III

The light, bold, fluttering little figure turned and came back safe to me, and I soon laughed at my fears, and at the cry I had uttered; fruitlessly in any case, for there was no one near.

Dickens Miscellanea

Benediction

by
Charles Dickens

May the blessings of our God rest upon thee, and the Son of Glory shine around thy head; may the gates of plenty, honor and happiness be always open to thee and thine.

May no strife disturb thy days, nor sorrow distress thy nights, and may the pillow of Peace kiss thy cheek, and pleasures of imagination attend thy dreams; when length of years makes thee tired of earthly joys and the curtains of death gently close around the scene of thy existence, may the angels of God attend thy bed, and take care that the expiring lamp of life shall not receive one rude blast to hasten its extinction; and, finally, may the Saviour's blood wash thee from all impurities and prepare thee to enter into the land of everlasting felicity.

I love him so for all the good
His soul was wont to see
In wretched, torn, misunderstood,
Unknown humanity.

In darkness he found light ; in pain
And error love divine.
He taught sad hearts to laugh again,
And hidden gold to shine.

He heard the Christmas Carols ring,
He pitied moth and snake ;
And had a song for ev'ry wing,
And balm for ev'ry ache !

OLIVER TWIST who had some very HARD TIMES in THE BATTLE OF LIFE, and having been saved from
THE WRECK OF THE GOLDEN
MARY by
OUR MUTUAL FRIEND
NICHOLAS NICKLEBY, had just finished reading
A TALE OF TWO CITIES to MARTIN CHuzzlewit, during which time
THE CRICKET ON THE HEARTH had been chirping right merrily, while
THE CHIMES from the adjacent church were heard, when SEVEN POOR TRAVELLERS commenced singing
A CHRISTMAS CAROL.
BARNABY RUDGE then arrived from
THE OLD CURIOSITY SHOP with some PICTURES FROM ITALY and SKETCHES BY BOZ, to show

LITTLE DORRIT, who was busy with the
PICKWICK PAPERS, when DAVID COPPERFIELD (who had been taking AMERICAN NOTES) entered and informed the company that the GREAT EXPECTATIONS of DOMBEY & SON regarding
MRS. LIRRIKER'S LEGACY had not been realised and that he had seen
BOOTS OF THE HOLLYTREE INN taking SOMEBODY'S LUGGAGE to MRS. LIRRIKER'S LODGINGS, in a street that has
NO THROUGHFARE, opposite
BLEAK HOUSE, where
THE HAUNTED MAN had just given one of

to an UNCOMMERCIAL TRAVELLER, who was brooding over
